For Export Salesmen

FOR travellers abroad – whether executives or salesmen – life is a series of problems. Such things as tickets, passports, driving licences, business cards, credit cards, etc. must be secure, but ready to hand, plus of course, the important documents and sales presentations needed to conduct the business at hand.

The Twinlock Pedigree Portfolio is basically a metal zipped loose-leaf ring binder covered in tough, practical Suplessa – a new p.v.c. based synthetic leather. It will hold all the auxiliary documents needed for quick, easy travel, planned presentations, etc., together with paper storage and filing space in a slim-line brief case measuring 10½ by 14½ by 1½ in.

On the inside front cover are built-in flaps to provide storage compartments for credit cards, business cards, stamps, tickets, driving licence and insurance certificate, plus a spare pocket. The flap system also provides storage space for papers of two different sizes. The inside back cover, again using flaps, provides filing space or more storage and a large pocket tailored to take passport, visas, etc.

To give additional control to papers in store another flap extends on each side of the central ring mechanism, which in turn is fitted with a pen or pencil holder.

With all the auxiliary papers safely tucked away, the majority of the space inside is given over to a writing area. A strong, central four-ring mechanism holds A.4 sheets ready to be written on with 'end sheets' of hard resilient bextrene polystyrene, to provide a firm writing base. The ring mechanism also holds six reversible plastic dividers, each coded in a different colour, to provide a flexible indexing system that can be tailored to suit individual needs.

The Pedigree Portfolio comes ready for use with the binder cover, and sheets, fifty ruled sheets of A.4 paper, six plastic dividers in three coded colours and a Twinlock Everclean envelope.

Price: £4 15s.

Push-button Dictation Unit

PUSH buttons instead of a dial on a telephone provide a quick and simple means of obtaining a number. Accordingly, the Dictaphone Co have introduced Touch 'n Talk. This is a device which, when attached to a PAX telephone, is an alternative method to dialling.

The main advantage of using internal telephone networks for remote-control dictation is low-cost flexibility. Everybody who has a telephone can use it for dictation. If, however, all the telephone instruments in a remote-control dictation installation have to be modified (to provide push-button operation) the initial cost is increased and the flexibility is reduced.

However, Touch 'n Talk is an optional attachment. It can be connected to the telephones of only those users whose dictation load justifies the facility of push-button control. Other users continue to use the dial as they normally do.

Dictaphone Co Ltd, 1 Knightsbridge Green, London SW1.

Push-button Telephones

WITH the advent of all-digit dialling, the day may not be far distant when callers will push buttons to obtain the connections they require. Push-button calling is quicker than dialling. Made by Shipton Automation and marketed by Modern Telephones (Gt Britain) Ltd is a new ten-key instrument, which can be connected to any PAX and is styled to GPO pattern 706.

Also available is the push-button Repertory Dialler; this comprises a pad of thirty keys and a small wall-mounted electronic storage unit. It can be connected to any PAX so that any one of thirty extensions can be obtained merely by pressing the appropriate keys. Furthermore, ten of the buttons can be marked from 0 to 9 and used as a speedier alternative to conventional dialling for intercom systems.

Computers and Local Government

OVER one hundred local government treasurers, surveyors and engineers recently attended a one-day conference in London on 'Computing for local government', organized by Honeywell Electronic Data Processing.

The seven papers presented at the conference, which was under the chairmanship of Mr Bernard Hazel, F.I.M.T.A., Treasurer of West Riding, have been made available by Honeywell in booklet form. It includes addresses given by Mr R. J. Bridle, B.Sc., C.Eng., A.M.I.C.E., M.I.H.E., of West Riding County Council, who discussed the part played by a computer in the surveyor's department; the past, present and future use of computers by the treasurer's department, by Mr E. A. Smith, A.I.M.T.A., manager of Honeywell's Local Authority and Public Utilities Sales Group, and an analysis of the possible financial applications that can be dealt with by a computer, by Mr Annand Shariff.

Copies of the booklet, entitled Computing for Local Government, are available from Honeywell Controls Ltd, Brentford, Middx.

New Computer for West Midlands Gas Board

THROUGH the installation at the end of this year of an I.C.T 1907 computer, the West Midlands Gas Board will have a data processing system capable not only of handling financial and technical calculations automatically, but also many aspects of administration, marketing and gas production and distribution.

The system will have many unique features including the use of visual display units. These devices, resembling television sets with typewriter keyboards added, will be installed in main showrooms and will be connected directly by landline or radio link to the computer situated at the Board's headquarters at Solihull, Birmingham.

The provision of visual display units and direct access stores will enable customers' questions to be answered on the spot. For example, by using a visual display unit located in a showroom, an assistant will be able to retrieve information on the exact state of a customer's account directly from the computer, or enter details of a new transaction. In computer terminology the machine will be operating on-line in real-time.

When a customer decides to buy an appliance, the salesman will not make out any documents but will instead operate a visual display unit. He will type out the customer's reference number or the customer's name and address together with details of the appliance required. Should he omit to enter certain relevant facts, then the computer will reflect these omissions. The computer will thus ensure, as far as is possible, that the basic information provided is both complete and accurate before it deals with an inquiry.

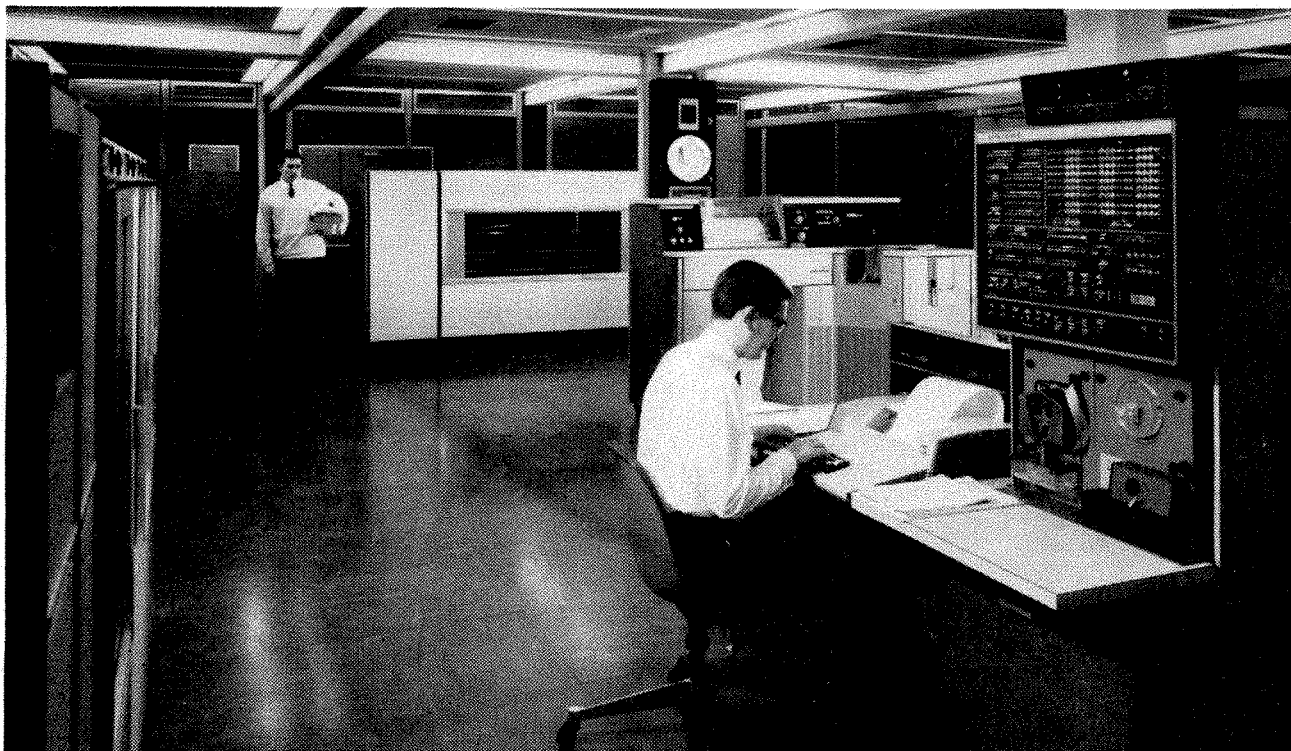

At the Board's headquarters, the computer will reveal whether the appliance is available, investigate the avail-

WOMEN CERTIFIED ACCOUNTANTS VISIT COMPUTER CENTRE

Some thirty members of the Certified Accountants Womens Society visited the National Cash Register company's computer centre in London last month where they participated in an orientation session involving the use of computers in accountancy.

A three-part lecture detailing 'What is a computer?', 'How it is used' and 'How does it store information?' was presented, followed by a demonstration illustrating banking applications on an N.C.R. 315 computer equipped with CRAM (Card Random Access Memory) magnetic file cards.

ability of fitters and then offer a firm delivery and fixing date to the customer.

Already the Board operates an I-C-T 1301 computer system which is equipped with six magnetic-tape units each with a data transfer rate of 90,000 characters a second. Included in the work it handles are customers' gas and hire-purchase accounts, together with wage, salary and pensions calculations for some 13,000 employees, and cash analysis and cost accounting reports.

Stock Market Information by Computer

THE first stock-market computer answering network, which takes the chores out of the work of investment analysts, commenced operating in London last month. Known as SCAN, the service is centred on a Univac 418 computer run by Intinco Ltd at its City offices and is claimed to be the most advanced real-time system of its kind in the investment world. It enables stockbrokers, merchant bankers or investors to 'speak' directly with an ordinary telephone and a simple typewriter keyboard to a computer and obtain immediate particulars or a complete run-down on such matters as a security's investment status, share comparisons, and portfolio valuation and analysis. It will even provide a list of securities to satisfy individual requirements.

Over the past three years, the stockbroking firm of Simon & Coates have assisted Intinco to plan and develop the system, and are the first firm of stockbrokers to use it. SCAN can handle many hundreds of subscribers and its random access library can hold 132 million characters, or pieces of information – enough to store a complete five-year history for all London quoted securities ten times over. It will also be able to handle information on leading provincial, American, European and other foreign securities.

Giro by Computer

THE Post Office has decided to use System 4/70 computers of the English Electric Leo Marconi Co in the new Giro office, and it was announced last week that a contract has been signed for the supply of five of these computers worth £3 million, with an option for a further four machines worth over £2 million. This will be the largest order ever for computer equipment placed outside the United States.

Two of the computers will go to Bootle to serve the Giro office due to open there in the second half of 1968; two more will be installed in Glasgow in the Savings Bank building, also due to come into use in 1968; and the fifth is for another of the Post Office's regional centres which will, in the next few years, handle a growing number of postal and telecommunications projects throughout the country.

The Giro office will use computers from the outset. Giro documents received daily at the office will be programmed so that the records of customers' accounts kept on magnetic tape can be up-dated; statements of accounts – printed on computer-controlled high-speed printers – will be produced at a rate of 5,000 an hour per machine. A special feature of the system is that, for large users, statements will be produced in printed form or in machine language (e.g. paper tape or magnetic tape) which can then be used without further treatment as input to the customer's own computer system.

It is planned to maintain records of Giro statements on microfilm and the possibility of producing the film directly from the magnetic tape record produced by the computer is being studied. Records of twenty-two million savings accounts will be kept on fifty reels of magnetic tape which will be processed through the computer every day to keep them up to date with account movements and to calculate the interest due.

Hattersley Holdings

THE accounts of Hattersley Holdings Ltd, from which this week's reprint comes, are the first to be presented under that name. The change to holding company formation was actually made on March 31st with a new operating subsidiary assuming the Hattersley (Ormskirk) name under which the parent company had previously been well and widely known in the engineering industry. These are the accounts presented to the forty-third annual meeting.

A feature of the profit and loss account, it will be seen, is the division of the source of trading profit between valves and related fittings and petrol pumps and electric motors, the total trading profits being over the £1 million mark for the first time. Turnover behind the profit, however, is left unstated.

In 'Financial statistics of the group', pre-tax profits of £638,000 are shown as 26.9 per cent on capital employed but the proportion of profit to turnover is, inevitably, unstated. That is unfortunate since one of the points Mr Hubert Nicholson, the chairman, makes in his review is, naturally enough under present circumstances, the pressure of new and increasing costs on earnings margins.

Showing 1965-66 profits at 26.9 per cent on capital employed – the highest percentage in any of the past ten years and compared with 22.4, 16.3 and 15.3 in the previous three years – hardly makes Mr Nicholson's point.

Why not now?

Reluctance to provide a turnover figure thereby reduces the impact of Mr Nicholson's statement that in spite of the hard work of employees 'it is becoming increasingly difficult to provide a reasonable return' on shareholders' capital, particularly now that 'the Government take over 60 per cent of the profits of industry by penal and complicated methods

Hayeshaw

THE annual report of Hayeshaw Ltd comes very close to giving the lie to the adage about quarts and pint pots. The final two pages – one titled 'Analysis of results' and the other 'Five-year record' plus 'Other statistics' – pack in more information than most companies of any kind would have considered justified, necessary or even feasible not much more than a decade ago.

Hayeshaw also has to overcome the problem posed by changing itself in recent years from a textile company with industrial attachments to a company currently operating two divisions – building supplies and services, and engineering. The five-year record successfully contends with this problem and 'Other statistics' deals with employees' share ownership, a five-year record of share prices and the 'Doomsday' share price.

The analysis of results shows the contribution to turnover and profits by each division in money and percentage terms. Intended new expansion may complicate things but the Hayeshaw report shows that its compilers have the knack of presenting complicated figures clearly.

For the present, it seems that expansion will be through developing current interests rather than buying new ones, although the latter course is certainly not ruled out.

CITY NOTES

THE London Stock Exchange seems resigned to the fact that any real recovery in markets is still a long way off. The few small rallies that occur do not delude anyone, for they are recognized for what they are – largely technical, and a short breathing space which comes after a heavy run down. Even a fall of some fifty-four points in The Financial Times Industrial Share Index in the month of July was not regarded as overdone in the circumstances.

That is gloomy reasoning but it stems from the obvious fact that the dividend freeze is well and truly on and that there is unlikely to be any 'getting round' the fact by creating special dividend reserves from which payments can be made later. Indeed, some of the more dismal prophets even hint at some form of tax to mop up any such accumulations, but possibly that in itself is an indication of the uncertain frame of mind in which the City views the outlook.

It has to be admitted, however, that so far there has been no pressing selling from those reducing overdrafts and only a trickle of liquidation from the vast army of unit-trust holders. Either of these movements could develop, and their effect on an unwilling market could be marked.

One of the life savers to which the City has been looking, is a possible return of institutional buyers. These undertakings are known to prefer franked income and for them equities hold attractions. But such buyers are likely to be selective and their choice would be blue chips with good dividend cover, which would hardly embrace the whole market, in conditions like those ruling at present.

For the City, as for the country as a whole, the future outlook is bound up in confidence, and how long it will be before this sadly lacking element returns. It is clearly not a time for fresh investment but at ruling price levels selling should only be of the very pressing variety. Only the very pessimistic would consider that recent measures will fail to produce the desired effect in the long run, but the road meanwhile may be a trifle rough.

COMPANIES seeking new finance are having to pay a full 8 per cent for accommodation and for investors looking purely for income there is no lack of opportunity. Even here, however, there are boards who are reluctant to come to the market at this level.

Lord Fraser, of the 'House of Fraser' stores group, has told shareholders that he is not going to tie the company to 8 per cent for twenty years, all the time the company's finances seem adequate for immediate requirements.

Mr J. R. Storar, chairman of Edmunds Walker, the cars-spares group, has made a similar decision saying it is considered inadvisable to raise new loan capital on the current terms.

Companies that can do so will doubtless call a halt to such financing, but others with big bank borrowing and with expansion schemes already launched may still have to pay 8 per cent plus for their accommodation.

At the same time, however, it is clear that many concerns are having second thoughts about factory extensions, new plant and similar moves, which itself is hardly a cheering prospect for share markets.

TAKE-OVERS are going to be less in evidence where the move is purely a competitive one with a would-be buyer battling for an unwilling seller. But mergers – with companies getting together to integrate, save costs and rationalize – are likely to continue, because current conditions make such moves almost imperative in many cases.

Whereas, however, in the 'auction' which often takes place in the former operation, shareholders see their share values run up, in the latter conditions investors' profits are likely to be smaller. That was the case with the recent British Motor Corporation-Jaguar link up, final terms of which showed only an increase of  $\frac{1}{4}$  per cent in the loan stock interest to take care of the changed market position.

The Sole Practitioner

SIR, - Following suggestions made at many of the meetings that have been held to discuss the Institute's Practice Administration booklets, the Public Relations Committee has decided to produce one dealing with the sole practitioner.

I hope that it will go far beyond a mere review of the problems and that it will record many constructive ideas about the ways in which sole practitioners organize their practices to best advantage. It will clearly deal with such matters as consultancy and the manner in which provision is made for the continuance of a practice during illness or after retirement or death.

The booklet will be written by the Secretariat of the Institute. Much material is already available from the replies to the Small Practitioner Enquiry and other sources but we hope that many members will help by making known to us their ideas.

A questionnaire has been prepared to bring the subject-matter into some sort of focus and I hope that many sole practitioners will help us by completing the questionnaire. As a first step, will they please write to the Secretary of the Institute at 56-66 Goswell Road, London EC1. All that is needed is a postcard with the name and address and the words 'Sole Practitioner Questionnaire'.

Yours faithfully,

E. K. WRIGHT,

Chairman, Public Relations Committee.

D.C.F. and Depreciation

SIR, - One welcomes constructive comments in your correspondent's letter headed 'D.C.F. and Depreciation' published in your issue of July 30th. There are two points I should like to make in reply - one general and one specific.

First, in writing an article for a periodical such as The Accountant which has a wide circulation and many of whose readers are no doubt very busy men, one has to make every endeavour to introduce a novel idea with clarity so as to aim at every reader understanding and following the article through to its end. These conditions and the limitation of space of an article render it necessary to keep to first principles and avoid complications which are not important. Where a factor is omitted or where factors introduced are simplified, it does not mean that the omission or simplification denies the existence of the complications in reality.

In my article 'Replacement Value and Depreciation', my aim was to try to evolve a system of depreciation superior to 'straight-line', which while it was a significant improvement was at the same time practicable. The article deals with annual valuations of fixed assets leading to depreciation which is an element of cost which is deducted from revenue to arrive at profit. Although the formula suggested in my article contains similarities to 'D.C.F.' and 'capital investment appraisal' (which your correspondent writes about), it is not the same as the latter which deals with profit appraisal, usually when a new investment is being considered.

It would be interesting if Mr Griffiths elaborated his formula for capital investment appraisal.

Yours faithfully,

D. C. BEATON, C.A.

Stanmore, Middlesex.

Bonus Issues

SIR, - Referring to Mr Sophian's article in your issue of July 2nd and to Mr A. Lloyd's letter in the July 16th issue, I am somewhat puzzled as to the result, under capital gains tax, of disposing of the bonus shares in question as computed by both these gentlemen.

In the Example 5 the market value of the 2,000 original shares is stated to be £1,500 which obviously must be after the bonus issue. What must be determined is how many of the 'original' shares (i.e. before the bonus) could have been purchased in the market for the sum of £800. If the price of the old shares ex bonus is 15s then, by arithmetic, one arrives at a 'notional' price for the shares cum bonus of 22s 6d. The number of shares 'purchaseable' would then be  $800/1.125 = 711$  shares. (Original cost £711.)

Consequently, 'B', the market value for the remaining (original) 1,289 shares at 22s 6d is, say, £1,450, and the portion of £2,000 cost, allocated to the 711 shares is:

$$£2,000 \times \frac{£800}{£800 + £1,450} = £711, \text{ as above}$$

Thus there is a gain on disposal of the bonus shares of £89, which seems more logical than Mr Lloyd's loss figure of £64. Under the short-term rules the gain is £104!

Perhaps Mr Sophian would like to comment further on this example, which is likely to occur frequently in practice.

Yours faithfully,

F. C. STONEHAM, F.C.A.

London EC2.

[Mr T. J. Sophian writes: It is obvious that the 2,000 'original shares', a proportion of which could have been purchased in the market for £800, are the original shares as such, which now carry the rights, and not the original shares as watered down and grouped with the new 1,000 bonus shares in the new holding, in which the original 2,000 shares have now lost their identity. In the example, the market value of £1,500 for the 2,000 original shares is their market value cum rights.

Perhaps example 5 could be made quite clear on this point if one added in the second line of the second paragraph, the words 'cum rights' after the words 'original shares'.

It should be emphasized that the apportioned cost of the remaining notional 1,400 original shares out of the 2,000 shares, would be notionally £1,136 (£2,000 [original cost] less £864 [apportioned cost of the 600 original shares]). The 3,000 shares (not 2,000 shares as erroneously stated in the example) in the new holding (2,000 old plus 1,000 new shares) would then represent these 1,400 original shares, and would have a notional apportioned cost of £1,136 (£2,000—£864).]

Taxation Cases

A full report of the cases summarized in these columns will be published, with Notes on the Judgments, in the 'Annotated Tax Cases'.

In re Gartside's Will Trusts

In the High Court of Justice (Chancery Division)
May 27th, 1966
(Before Mr Justice UNGOED-THOMAS)

Estate duty – Shares of residue on discretionary trusts during son's life – Surplus income accumulated – After son's death capital and income for his children with remainders over – Power of advancement – Exercise in favour of two of son's children – Son dying shortly afterwards – Whether children had had interests in possession – Finance Act 1894, sections 1, 2 (1) (b) – Finance Act 1940, section 43.

The testator made his will in 1934 and died in 1941. The will gave a one-fourth share of residue on discretionary trusts during his son's lifetime for applying the income wholly or partly as the trustees thought fit for the benefit of the son and his wife and children. After the son's death, the capital and income were to go to the son's children on attaining 21 or, being female, marrying under that age; and there were remainders over. Surplus income was to be accumulated during the son's life, to follow his one-fourth share, but resort could be had to the accumulations. In 1961 the net income was about £3,900 a year. In May 1961, £786 of income was paid under the discretionary trust for the benefit of the testator's son, and in the next month £50 was similarly applied.

In 1962 the trustees exercised their power of advancement in favour of the testator's two grandsons, and the advancement was by the making of a settlement on each of them. In each settlement the amount advanced was a quarter of the son's quarter share of the trust fund, exclusive of accumulations. In the events which happened the grandsons became entitled under their settlements to demand the transfer of the sums advanced if they became 21. From the date of the advancement all the trust income was paid to the son. In January 1962, the accumulations came to more than £55,000, and the value of the son's quarter share was £93,700. In the same month the accumulations period ended, and in May 1963 the son died. At the date of his death the value of the advance to each grandson was £23,500. Estate duty was claimed on the son's death on each of the amounts advanced.

It was contended by the Revenue that under section 43 of the Finance Act 1940, an interest limited to cease on a death had been determined after becoming an interest in possession, in that each of the grandsons had had an interest in possession as a discretionary beneficiary. It was contended that 'interest in possession' in the section was any interest which related to current income; and alternatively that the right of the discretionary beneficiaries to have a proper exercise of the discretion as to income by the trustees was an interest related to current income, as was also the right of those interested in the accumulations to have the trustees accumulate current income subject to a proper exercise of their discretion.

Held: (1) no one discretionary beneficiary had an interest in possession within section 43; (2) the beneficiaries as a group did not have such an interest; (3) those interested in the accumulations did not have such an interest either individually or as a group; (4) section 40 was not applicable.

Saxone, Lilley & Skinner (Holdings) Ltd v. C.I.R.

In the Court of Session
February 17th, 1966

Income tax – Capital allowances – Trade of storage of manufactured goods not yet delivered – Central warehouse for group companies – Storage of shoes – Some manufactured by group but not yet delivered – Others bought by group from manufacturer – Whether industrial building or structure – Income Tax Act 1952, section 271 (1) (d) (iii), (2).

The appellant company erected a building and let it to one of its subsidiaries carrying on the business of the warehousing of shoes. The building, a large one, provided a central warehouse for all the companies in the appellant's group, and it had a very substantial turnover of shoes every year, though each pair of shoes remained in the warehouse for only a few weeks. The shoes fall into two categories: (1) those manufactured by a member of the group, but not yet delivered to a purchaser; (2) those bought by a member of the group from a manufacturer, whether inside or outside the group.

The appellant claimed capital allowances in respect of the building. The Inland Revenue contended that the warehouse was not in use for the purposes of a trade consisting in the storage of goods or materials, but was a distribution centre for the group. The Special Commissioners decided in favour of the Revenue. In the Court of Session it was further argued that the appellant's claim was defeated by section 271 (3), because the building was in use for a purpose ancillary to the purposes of a retail shop.

Held: the warehouse satisfied the description in section 271 (1) (d) (iii) and was therefore an industrial building or structure; and that section 271 (3) was non-applicable.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT REORGANIZATION

The Royal Commission on Local Government in England has held two preliminary meetings and has now decided to extend an open invitation to all who wish to submit written evidence on any matter within its terms of reference.<sup>1</sup>

The Commission hopes that there will be a full response to its general invitation not only from official and other organizations, including professional bodies, but also from private citizens, whose interests must be the main concern of any system of local government.

The Royal Commission is particularly anxious to receive evidence which contains positive suggestions for improving the structure and effectiveness of local government. It may later seek supplementary written evidence on problems which early investigations show require special consideration, and will also decide what oral evidence to take.

The recently reorganized structure of London's local government is not within its terms of reference, but the Commission will be glad to receive evidence about the way the new system is working in so far as this is relevant to consideration of local government elsewhere. It will also examine the relationship between the pattern of local government in adjoining areas and the outer boundaries of Greater London.

All evidence should be addressed to the Secretary, Royal Commission on Local Government in England, Gwydyr House, Whitehall, London SW1, to be received not later than September 30th.

<sup>1</sup> 'To consider the structure of local government in England, outside Greater London, in relation to its existing functions; and to make recommendations for authorities and boundaries, and for functions and their division, having regard to the size and character of areas in which these can be most effectively exercised and the need to sustain a viable system of local democracy.'

IN PARLIAMENT*Selective Employment Tax: Charities

Mr DIAMOND: Under the provisions of the Selective Employment Payments Bill organizations which are registered under the Act and which have paid tax will have it refunded. So also will organizations which the Charity Commissioners or the Secretary of State for Education and Science certify to be exempt or excepted from the requirement to be registered. It is not at present known which organizations will fulfil either of these conditions.

CHARTERED ACCOUNTANTS' HOCKEY CLUB

An evenly-matched game between the Chartered Accountants' Hockey Club and Purley, played at Purley, resulted in a win for the accountants by 3-2.

Jim Threlfall scored early in the first half and at this stage the accountants appeared well in command and were better in positioning and control. Purley gradually improved and were rewarded with a scrambled goal near the end of the first half.

In the second half, Purley took the lead with a shot which was left alone by the defending players as everyone except the umpire believed the ball had been struck outside the circle. This inspired the accountants to greater efforts which led to a goal by Bob Wagle, and in the closing stages Arnold Bradbury put the accountants in the lead.

The Chartered Accountants' team was: J. Glover, K. Ford, P. Watson, G. Davis, C. P. de Souza, P. A. Davies, G. Robson, A. Bradbury, B. Wagle and J. Threlfall. Both sides fielded ten men.

Corporation Tax Machinery

NOT the least wordy of the provisions in the Finance Act 1966 which received the Royal assent on Wednesday of last week, are those dealing with the machinery of assessment of corporation tax. Section 27 laconically provides that 'Schedule 6 to this Act, which contains administrative provisions for the Corporation Tax Acts, shall have effect'. The section has to be construed as one with the Corporation Tax Acts, so Schedule 6 must be construed likewise. It consists of twenty-seven paragraphs covering fourteen pages, and even these are not the whole story because they incorporate by reference many more provisions of the Income Tax Acts.

That the Corporation Tax Acts apply is shown by paragraph 24 headed 'Responsibility of company officers'. Although the schedule talks about 'companies', when it deals with the responsibility of 'the proper officer' for corporation tax it defines him in two ways. In relation to a body corporate, he is the secretary or person acting as secretary, unless a liquidator has been appointed. If the 'company' is not a body corporate or does not have a secretary, the proper officer is the treasurer or person acting as treasurer.

Now the secretary of a company is often a somewhat subordinate person compared with the directors; nevertheless it is upon him that the burden of paying the tax lies. True, he is allowed to recoup himself out of the moneys of the company, but suppose it has none? We can instance the case of a company which made a £20,000 trading loss and a £20,000 chargeable gain. It must pay £8,000 tax without relief for the loss, but it may have no assets at all.

So those who contemplate taking the post of secretary in a company are enjoined to beware. He may well be required to bolster up the Exchequer out of his own pocket to an unlimited amount, while presumably the shareholders and directors rest on the sacred principle of limited liability.

A company which is chargeable to corporation tax for an accounting period and has not made a return, must give notice to the Inspector of Taxes within one year after the end of the period, or April 6th, 1967, if that is later. The penalty for failure (deliberate or inadvertent) is £100.

An inspector can demand a return of the profits 'computed in accordance with the Corporation Tax Acts'. This seems a little unfair as most inspectors – not to mention Government spokesmen — themselves seem to be somewhat unsure about what these Acts mean. Besides showing the profits, the return has to show a number of other things all of which are bound to involve a good deal of head scratching. They include the amount of 'income' from each 'source' taken into account in computing the profits; the disposals with amounts of chargeable gains or allowable losses; and the 'charges' to be deducted. If the profits include items taxed at source, particulars must be shown. To pile Pelion on Ossa, the return must include a declaration 'to the effect that the return is correct and complete' — not, be it noted, correct to the best of the judgement of the unfortunate person making the return; he must assume a godlike omniscience not pretended to by any Somerset House official.

Faced with such a daunting task, company officials might well feel disposed to 'neglect' or 'refuse' to make the return — if we may use words familiar in the old income tax penalty sections. But the corporation tax penalty sections are even more searching than those; they apply even where there has been mere failure to comply with a notice to make a return.

Nor is the penalty merely nominal; it starts, it is true, at £50 plus £10 a day for a continuance after the failure has been declared by the Court or the Commissioners. But if the failure goes on for two years after the notice, then there is a further penalty equal to the tax; and all this without the Revenue having to prove any neglect, still less refusal (paragraph 3).

Where the company is fraudulent or negligent there are, as might be expected, further penalties. These are for incorrect returns, incorrect claims, and also incorrect amounts if these are submitted to the inspector in connection with the ascertainment of the company's liability to tax. As with income tax, the penalties are the amount of the tax in the case of negligence; and twice that amount in the case of fraud. They apply also where the initial incorrectness is innocent but the company fails to correct it when the truth is known.

Turning from returns to assessments, paragraph 6 applies section 5 of the Income Tax Management Act 1964, which gives the inspector the power to make assessments 'to the best of his judgement' except in the rare event that he is 'satisfied' with the return. He must serve notice on the company, but no time limit is laid down for such service. On the other hand, the company can appeal only within thirty days after the 'date' of the notice of assessment, which is usually regarded as the date it bears rather than the date when it is actually issued.

There are complicated rules about when the appeal is to be to the General Commissioners or to the Special Commissioners. In general, appeal lies to the former unless the appellant specifies the latter; but management expenses questions are reserved to the Special Commissioners. The grounds of appeal must be stated.

The appropriate time limits for making assessments can be ascertained only after a careful study of paragraphs 7–10. In general, the inspector must make his assessment not later than six years after the end of the accounting period; but if it is argued that he has exceeded that limit, the point can be taken only on an appeal, not by proceedings in Court to have the assessment set aside. Moreover, there are so many extensions of the six years that one can never be sure that an assessment apparently out of time, is not in fact valid.

There is the familiar dropping of all time limits where the assessment is to make good a loss of tax occasioned by fraud or wilful default committed by or on behalf of the company. Interest is chargeable in those cases and also where the assessment is made to recover tax lost through the company's neglect. If an assessment is made in due time to recover tax lost wholly or partly through any of those three things, then there is provision for leapfrogging backwards, similar to the case of income tax. This is in order to enable the Revenue to recover tax lost through the company's earlier neglect; that is to say, corporation tax, income tax and profits tax. The provisions are extremely complicated.

The time limits for claims for relief, in paragraph 11 of Schedule 6, are also complicated. In general the limit is six years from the end of the accounting period. A claim to set off a loss against a profit of the same period must be made within two years. A claim to carry forward a loss and set it off against subsequent profits must be made within six years after the loss period, notwithstanding that available profits do not arise until much later. There are special provisions in paragraph 18 about claims to relief under section 62 of the Finance Act 1965 whereby losses, etc., are set off against franked investment income.

The complexity of the legislation is sure to result in many disputes and paragraph 12 provides for proceedings before Appeal Commissioners. It applies sections 11, 12, 14 and 15 of the Income Tax Management Act 1964. In appeals before General Commissioners, the appropriate division is the one in which the company carries on business, or in which its head office is situated, as the Act puts it, 'where it resides'. This is subject to sections 143 and 329 of the Income Tax Act 1952 which provide for the appearance of a third party who may be affected by the proceedings. The provisions for settling appeals by agreement are applied, and to save Commissioners from making new declarations of secrecy their existing declarations are extended to corporation tax by the schedule.

Pension Fund Potentialities

THE important and growing part that pension schemes play in the national economy can be gauged from the report (to which we referred in 'Current Affairs' last week) on a new survey by the Government Actuary of occupational pension schemes.

These schemes may collectively be regarded from two points of view. First, it is to such schemes that a large and increasing number of people must look for a considerable part of their income in old age. Secondly, they represent one of the main channels of private saving and their investment exercises a powerful influence on Stock Exchanges and some sections of the property market; from a broader point of view, those who manage such investment can exercise a considerable and potentially highly discriminating influence over industrial development.

Appendix I to the report contains interesting estimates of the income and outgo of pension schemes in 1963, in both the public and the private sectors, and from the figures given, further deductions may be made. In the public sector, for many pension schemes (including that for the Civil Service), funds are not accumulated, contributions of the employer being generally adjusted to preserve from year to year a balance of income and outgo.

Some schemes, notably in the nationalized industries and for local authorities, are fully funded and the figures given show income from contributions of £135 million and net interest earnings of £85 million, together exceeding outgo on benefits by £130 million. From these figures it seems that the accumulated funds of these schemes must by now be of the order of £2,000 million and are likely to increase by a further £1,500 million over the next ten years.

The figures for the private sector are even more striking. Here funds are normally built up and they may be invested directly or through life insurance companies. In 1963 funds directly invested had a contribution income of £235 million and net interest earnings of £140 million which together exceeded outgo on benefits and expenses by £250 million. The funds at the present time are likely to be between £3,000 and £4,000 million.

The income in the same year of funds invested through life assurance companies consisted of contributions of £220 million and net interest earnings of £100 million and exceeded outgo on benefits and expenses by £180 million. These funds are likely now to be over £2,500 million. In the case of both funds invested directly and those invested through life assurance companies, the present rate of growth suggests that they too may double over the next decade.

From pension funds as a whole, therefore, a sum rising from £600 million to perhaps £1,000 million may become available each year for new investment between now and the mid-1970s.

These funds are likely to continue to grow so that their assets should not need to be realized to pay benefits for a long time. Hence it is natural in times of high interest rates to seek long-dated investments for them. The question may be asked whether the ordinary methods of investment do not lead to too keen competition for a somewhat narrow range of stocks and shares. As when the Macmillan Committee reported some thirty years ago, small enterprises, on whose growth much of Britain's future national prosperity depends, still have difficulty in raising long-term capital, despite various institutions having been set up to remedy this deficiency. Security for the ultimate beneficiaries of pension funds is essential. Is there room for some possibly co-operative endeavour, not under Government sponsorship, to use some part of these funds more systematically for this purpose to the advantage of those interested in the funds and of the nation as a whole?

Another interesting reflection is prompted by the tables contained in the report as to the way in which the funds of schemes in the private sector are invested. Of the members of such schemes, Table 4 shows that in 1963 about  $4\frac{1}{4}$  million members were in schemes whose funds were invested through life assurance companies and about  $2\frac{3}{4}$  million in schemes with funds directly invested. From Tables 3, 4 and 5 it may be deduced that for about 8,000 of the 60,000 schemes involved, the funds were directly invested and that the average membership of those 8,000 schemes was about 350 while that of the 52,000 schemes whose funds were invested through life assurance companies was about 80.

Although, as the report points out, some of the largest schemes are invested through life assurance companies, nevertheless only about one-third of schemes with more than 1,000 members are so invested. This points to a feature of common experience: it is natural for a small employer to seek the help of a life assurance company to establish a pension scheme, as in such cases this is often the most economical way of doing it. If his business expands, the time comes when the balance of advantage may shift towards the fund being directly invested. Some life assurance companies recognize this trend as a natural one, and put no great obstacle in the way of the employer who wishes to terminate his arrangements with them on reasonable terms.

Life assurance companies, like those who manage directly invested funds, generally at present prefer long-term investments. The possibility of surrender of large policies for cash can thus be a disturbing influence on investment policy. Would it not be possible to devise arrangements so that, for those life assurance companies which at present severely discourage surrender, this could be effected on the basis of a transfer of securities equivalent to that part of the life assurance company's portfolio held for the pension fund concerned?

Betterment Levy Muddle

IN all the welter of muddled legislation with which the public is now afflicted, there is perhaps nothing more muddled than the present position about the interaction of the proposed betterment levy on the new capital gains tax. In the memorandum it has sent to the responsible Minister (reproduced elsewhere in this issue), The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales has done well to spotlight the confusion to which the Land Commission Bill has given rise.

The original White Paper on the Bill promised that 'development value will be excluded from capital gains for the purposes of capital gains tax . . .'. Then on December 14th, the Government oracle in the form of Mr Diamond told the House of Commons that the betterment levy would not exclude capital gains tax; it would simply be allowed as an expense. To this one can say 'thank you for nothing'. Surely at the very least one tax should be set off against the other.

The reply of Mr Diamond nearly eight months ago is all we have to go on up to date. The current Land Commission Bill, like the Finance Act 1966, is silent about this very important matter. The Institute's memorandum points out other uncertainties which ought to be cleared up at once.

The Rate for the Job

AS reported in the proceedings of the Council on other pages, The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales is forming a committee to consider the likely future demand for the services of Institute members; what recruitment policies should be pursued in order to meet these demands; to what extent the intake of articled clerks will in consequence have to be regulated; and the question of competition from alternative occupations faced with manpower problems of equal magnitude.

Two salary surveys which have just come to hand may give the new committee some guidance on the last of these delicate problems. One is an analysis prepared by The Graduate Appointments Register of the salaries being earned by 4,712 men and women with, in nearly all cases, degrees or professional qualifications who were accepted on to the Register during the first six months of this year. It should be noted that the Register exists primarily to help those between 20 and 45 and currently earning less than £3,500 a year.

In the statistics given, applicants are categorized into twenty-four occupations and are divided within each into four equal five-year age groups between 20 and 40. The last of these, 36-40, is probably the most informative and accountants who, alphabetically, head the list have a median salary of £2,000 with the upper decile £3,000. Graduates in marketing and advertising come next and here the corresponding upper decile is £5,000. It is a little difficult to understand why anyone earning that sum should require the services of the Register. By comparison with the other listed occupations, accountants appear generally to get off the mark more quickly in the earlier years but are little more than average earners by the time they reach the 36-40 group.

The other publication, a much more comprehensive affair, has been prepared by Challoner Management Appointments Ltd. Its object was to discover how executive salaries are controlled and how scales are constructed and reviewed. The material on which the findings are based was supplied by 120 industrial and commercial companies of all sizes who co-operated in answering a range of searching questions.

Two general conclusions clearly emerge from the investigation. One is that salary administration is a key factor to the control of manpower and that too few companies go about it systematically. The other is that companies invariably service their capital but seldom their skilled manpower. Among other more specific findings are these – only a minority of companies really know what their executives are worth; many companies have no positive salary policy but simply act defensively when faced with outside competition; not many companies distinguish between merit increases and cost of living increases; a substantial number of companies operate bonus schemes but these rewards tend to fall arbitrarily on the undeserving as well as on the deserving; an executive's value depends on three factors: the market, the job, and the man's performance; but few companies make intelligent appraisals (and periodic reappraisals) of all three.

The survey also throws light on such questions – too seldom ventilated – as how long it should take an able man to get to the top; what, quantitatively, is a sensible increase; at what income level do fringe benefits become more attractive than cash rises; and what are the most popular fringe benefits. It may surprise some executives who think that they know everything about this last-mentioned form of remuneration to learn that no fewer than thirty-three examples were reported.

Stable Profits

ACCORDING to an analysis prepared by the Board of Trade's Statistics Division and published in the Board of Trade Journal last week, the 637 quoted companies whose accounts appeared between April 1st and June 30th enjoyed profits some 3 per cent higher than in the previous year. This increase matched that recorded between the two preceding years. Nearly two-thirds of these accounts related to a financial year corresponding to the calendar year, thus the figures can be described as reflecting the experience of the companies during 1965.

This sample of companies, which together comprise just under one-third of all companies engaged mainly in manufacturing and distribution in the U.K., also accounted for two-fifths of the total assets and income of all quoted companies. It is not, however, a random sample owing to the over-weighting of the final results due to the inclusion of the two giants, Unilever and I.C.I., in this particular quarter. Nevertheless, when adjustments are made to account for the biased distribution of companies in the sample, aggregate profits during 1965 seem to have been quite well maintained.

The experience of different industrial groups varied however. Textiles showed to best advantage with profits 8 per cent higher, while the various branches of engineering had between 5 and 7 per cent increases in profits. In contrast, shipbuilding profits dropped by no less than 89 per cent and vehicles by 8 per cent.

The first results of the changed method of corporate taxation are evident in this sample. According to the Journal, for the 385 companies showing all or part of their 1965 dividends gross, the amount of tax payable was about £37 million on gross dividends of £89 million. The overall effect of the new basis is that appropriations for tax were proportionately smaller in 1965, 27 per cent as against 35 per cent in 1964. Retained profits were correspondingly higher, 24 per cent as against 19 per cent in 1964. Dividend distributions rose by only 1 per cent, or £3 million. In contrast, depreciation provision plus retention rose from £533 million in 1964 to £650 million in 1965.

Trends in Export Merchandising

THE Association of British Chambers of Commerce has issued the results of its fourteenth inquiry among merchants in the United Kingdom engaged in foreign trade. The report is based on the replies of 269 merchants with an estimated turnover of about £240 million a year. Of these, 229 were exporters and 131 were importers, there being some overlap between importers and exporters.

The main activities covered by the survey were food and drink covering 34 per cent of all returns, engineering 31 per cent, textiles and clothing 30 per cent, textile materials 23 per cent and the rest. Here again the total exceeds 100 per cent since merchants trade in a range of products. About two-thirds of those replying, both exporters and importers, were less optimistic about the general business situation than they were four months ago and very few were more confident. Opinion about exports prospects alone seems somewhat more optimistic, about 60 per cent expecting little change, one-third predicting a decline and a small number expecting some improvement.

The outlook in export markets is variable. All trades except 'other manufacturers' reported improving prospects in North America and all except textiles and clothing reported a better outlook in Western Europe and Communist countries. All groups expect some decline in the Middle East, Africa and Australasia, India and Pakistan. All except chemicals are pessimistic about the outlook in South-east Asia, Japan and Central and South America.

U.K. Trade Deficit

SEASONALLY adjusted, the trade deficit in the first half of 1966 was running at £30 million a month; but if the first five months of the year are taken (thereby excluding the June figures which were seriously affected by the seamen's strike) the deficit average was just under £25 million compared with £22 million a month during 1965 and £45 million in 1964. Again excluding the June figures, exports for the first five months were 5½ per cent above the monthly average for the year of 1965. Imports in the first five months were 4 per cent higher than the corresponding period for 1965.

The increase in exports was mainly due to continuing high exports to North America and continuing expansion to both the European Free Trade Association and the European Economic Community. Exports to the sterling area were lower. The main groups contributing to the higher exports were machinery, aircraft, food, drink and tobacco. In the case of imports, capital equipment – especially machinery – increased sharply at the beginning of 1966 and the value of imported semi-manufactured goods also increased, partly due to higher prices – notably copper.

So far as the source of imports is concerned, in the first five months of 1966 the main areas from which manufactures came were Western Europe and North America. In the case of North America, most of the increase was from the United States. Imports from Western Europe were substantially higher from the European Free Trade Association countries at 13 per cent and from Common Market at 11 per cent, but imports from the sterling area in these five months were 1 per cent lower.

This is My Life

by An Industrious Accountant

IN a company like ours where the accounts staff on routine work is relatively large and the few specialist problems are highly concentrated, the chief accountant is very close to the details of the job. Continually meeting colleagues in corridors, staff conferences and the canteen, he hears all the news and is aware of problems as they arise. Delegation down the line is – or should be – balanced by rapid feedback of vital information, thus equating the workload, but involvement in solution-finding is high.

In consequence, it's easy to blunder in the transmission of responsibility. As Kai Lung remarked in polished phrase: 'Among the innumerable drawbacks of an exacting position the enforced reliance upon an unusually inept and more than ordinarily self-opinionated inscriber of the spoken word is perhaps the most illimitable'.

Having been personally inconvenienced by similar misunderstandings a couple of times I thought regretfully of the sophisticated administrative system of my old friend, Richard, who is chief accountant to a modern, mammoth enterprise. His reputed efficiency is a byword among the local accountants, and I decided to visit him to gain benefit from his wisdom, like Saul at the feet of Gamaliel.

Richard inhabits a sumptuously-furnished room half-way up an enormous glass-walled tower with luxurious air-conditioning, numerous noiseless lifts, uniformed receptionists standing by to guide visitors on every landing; everywhere there is an atmosphere of quiet efficiency. His internationally affiliated company is involved in something so costly and esoteric in the field of electronics, or computer hardware and know-how, or thermodynamics, that I can never quite comprehend what it's actually being paid for, but it can afford an enormous highly-paid staff. He produced his organization chart and we settled down to chat.

The 'family tree' proliferated rapidly. One branch dealt primarily with multi-factory unit costings; Richard said that they were restructuring their process analysis from a combination of direct v. indirect costs, and fixed v. variable costs to apportionable v. programmed costs. The underlying policy was somewhat controversial and he was awaiting a subcommittee's report on its merits and demerits.

The next branch dealt with liquid assets. His company's annual progress was highlighted by enormous peaks and troughs in cash available, so this section was responsible for the investment portfolios and/or bank overdraft. At present, money being scarcer than ever, they were trying to negotiate a special short-term loan either abroad or in Euro-dollars. Restrictions on credit had been significant but Richard always left these details to his subordinates.

The taxation section comprised the real high-powered eggheads – a team of skilled accountants and lawyers currently run off their feet with pressure of work on capital gains matters. He'd have liked to sit in on their studies, he confessed gloomily, tax having fascinated him since his articulated-clerk days, but it was a specialist's sphere nowadays. They briefed him whenever they'd time, but actually it was confusing unless one worked whole time on it.

In addition, he had an assistant sitting in liaison with the legal section, another with the pension committee, and a third with welfare and training in the employee relations department. His deputy was responsible for the more orthodox financial operations, payroll, statutory accounts, etc. . . .

No, it wasn't really involved, he protested, just a matter of basic delegation. He held regular meetings to optimize communications, but of course he didn't feel it necessary to be familiar with day-to-day matters at all. After all, he saw himself primarily as an economic administrator, a senior executive co-ordinating the activities of his experts who must necessarily have maximum local autonomy. He didn't believe in interfering with their initiative unless they asked him for help. But sometimes, he admitted, in moments of nostalgic depression he had a hankering to be an accountant again.

Trading with the United States

THE United States is the richest market in the world and the success or otherwise of British exports in competition with other countries exporting to the United States is a useful indication of the United Kingdom's competitive power. According to the latest D.E.A. Progress Report for July 1966, the United Kingdom sells more to the United States than to any other single country. In 1965 a tenth of its total exports went to the United States alone. Exports were larger only to the European Free Trade Association and the European Economic Community.

In terms of the average annual increase in exports, the performance over the ten years 1954-64 was best with the European Economic Community with an increase of 9 per cent. Exports to the United States averaged an 8 per cent increase per annum. In 1965 United Kingdom exports to the United States rose by as much as 23 per cent and in 1966 they were running about 20 per cent above last year's record average until the seamen's strike.

Over the ten years other industrial countries increased their exports to the United States by 9.7 per cent so far as manufactures were concerned. The United Kingdom's share of United States' imports of manufactures thus declined but the fall was smaller than the United Kingdom's share of all industrial countries' imports of manufactures.

G.P.O. to be a Public Corporation

IT was announced last week that a White Paper will be published in the spring of 1967 followed by legislation in the spring or summer of 1968 on the transformation of the General Post Office from a Government Department with a Minister at its head to a public corporation operating with a board like other nationalized industries. In this way a telecommunications, postal and banking complex with a turnover of £700 million a year and a turnover as agent of £7,000 million a year will undergo a major transformation.

The decision announced by the Postmaster-General has been under way since about 1956. Mr Short, the present Postmaster-General, has decided that Civil Service management leads to over-centralization and although a reconstruction remains to be worked out in detail, the separation is already foreseen of telecommunications, postal business and banking with probably more devolution to regions and head postmasters.

Budgetary Control as an Instrument of Management in the Smaller Company

by R. W. POWELL, C.A.

How a system of budgetary control assists management to delegate responsibility, at the same time providing information for control.

ONE of the problems of management has always been when companies start to expand – they eventually grow to such a size that a manager cannot be directly responsible, in detail, for the operation of every facet of the business. He has to delegate, and it is a measure of the success of the man as a manager – and often of the success of the company itself – as to the degree to which responsibility is delegated.

In recent times, the increasing complexity of commercial life has brought this necessity to delegate to even the smallest company. The task of the manager is growing more difficult and it is no longer possible for him to attend to every detail and do justice to every task. He must delegate some of it.

A system of budgetary control will assist a manager to delegate complete responsibility for departments and sections of the company, at the same time providing him with sufficient information whereby he can ensure that everything is going as well as, or better than, the plan, or that steps have been taken to remedy the situation where everything is not going as planned.

For example, in a company where the managing director has a sales manager, a works manager, a chief accountant, and a development engineer responsible to him, the allocation of responsibility could be:

(a) the sales manager for:

- (i) sales – in quantity and value;
- (ii) selling and distribution expenses;
- (iii) publicity;

(b) the works manager for:

- (i) output in quantity and value;
- (ii) direct labour;

This is one of the papers given at a series of conferences on 'Some problems of the growing firm', arranged by the Industrial and Commercial Finance Corporation at industrial centres throughout the country during the first six months of 1966.

- (iii) factory overheads;
- (iv) purchases of raw materials;
- (v) stocks of raw materials, work in progress and sundries;
- (c) the chief accountant for:
  - (i) salaries and expenses of office management staff;
  - (ii) administration expenses including items such as legal and audit fees;
- (d) the development engineer for:
  - (i) salaries and expenses of design staff;
  - (ii) research and development costs.

The managing director, having delegated authority to these four officials, is normally interested mainly in the overall control of each of the above main headings, and co-ordination of the various functions, leaving it to his subordinates to re-delegate sections of their budget further down the line. For example, the works manager will delegate responsibility for:

- (a) direct labour and factory overheads, shop by shop, to the shop managers;
- (b) some factory expenses to the shop managers;
- (c) maintenance costs and maintenance stores to the maintenance manager;
- (d) stocks of raw materials and sundry stores to the buyer.

On the other hand, the managing director himself will retain the responsibility for some decisions – where the interests of departments are likely to conflict. For example, he will probably decide the levels of stocks of finished goods, and give final authority to selling prices.

In smaller companies, the managing director may also retain a specific function – for example, that of works manager, so that, having delegated responsibility for sales and general administration, he still has the production budget in his own portfolio. In such a case, he should break down the production budget into shops and departments as appropriate, and delegate responsibility for the shops or departments to the production staff.

Requirements of a system of budgetary control

An effective system of budgetary control requires:

- (a) a plan;
- (b) a budget;
- (c) delegation and definition of responsibility;
- (d) feed-back information as to actual and budgeted expenditure to enable a control to be effected.

The plan

Before the budgets can be prepared, the company needs a plan to ensure that all departments are working to the same overall objective. For a meaningful budget the company will need a plan for a year ahead in detail, and a further plan in broader terms for from three to five years ahead.

The plan and the budget should also cover capital expenditure, and here it may be necessary to prepare a detailed plan for more than one year ahead, since in many cases delivery time exceeds one year, and decisions must be taken during the current year which will not be really effective for two or three years.

The budget

The preparation of budgets is not an accounting function – it is the responsibility of the whole management team. The accountant may assist – by providing information about past results, and converting budgets, in terms of production hours, items sold, etc., into cash. But it is important that budgets should be prepared by, and agreed by, the appropriate levels of management.

The secret of budgetary control is that every item of expenditure, however small, must be allocated to someone specifically for the purposes of control and authorization, and here a good organization chart will enable the management to allocate expenditure logically to those who will be responsible for controlling it.

Sometimes the responsibility will fall easily to one function and allocation is simple. In other cases the use of the service paid for is shared by many departments. In this case one individual will be selected to control the account – and his authority must be upheld. For example, if one person will be responsible for controlling the telephone account, the management must agree to uphold that person in any systems or policies that are established to control the cost, even though this may upset or offend members of their own staff.

In effect, every penny of the operational expenditure is delegated to some specific person, and his budget will contain only those items over which he has control. If somebody else has control of an item – even though it affects the day-to-day working of his department – he will not have that item in his budget.

Delegation

The allocation of responsibility for expenditure continues through several levels. For example:

- (a) the managing director may allocate responsibility for the electricity account to the works manager as part of works expenses;
- (b) the works manager may in turn allocate responsibility to the works engineer;
- (c) the works engineer may make the assistant works engineer responsible for controlling the expenditure on electricity.

Feed-back of information

It is not enough to prepare a budget and leave it at that. During the year cost comparison statements comparing actual results with the budget are prepared for every person who is responsible for controlling a vote. In turn, a summary of these statements would be prepared for the works manager, chief accountant or sales manager, etc. This return would contain a summary of the information contained on the individual statements. Indeed in some cases, it may be better to copy the statements rather than to make a separate summary of them – it depends on the nature and size of the business. And the general manager, or managing director, would in turn receive a summary of the results for the works manager, sales manager, chief accountant and development engineer.

In all instances the statement should be accompanied by a very brief report from the person concerned, commenting on the results and saying what steps have been taken to remedy adverse trends. Thus a shop manager would report to the works manager about the results of his shop, while the works manager would report to the managing director about the whole of the works activity.

Thus it can be seen that a budget is built up step by step – from individuals responsible for expenditure, through summaries at each level, until the managing director is concerned with only the broadest information. Similarly, the reporting of actual expenditure, and comparison with budget, builds up from detailed statements for those at the lowest level to broader statements for those at the top.

Other information

It is frequently possible to extract information from the budgets which will enable a comparison of budgeted and actual results to be made before the accounts are drawn up. For example, further information derived from the budgets may be:

- (a) Personnel, by grade or trade, analysed by shops and budget centres. Where trade is seasonal, or an increase in personnel is budgeted during the year, the personnel budget may be analysed into weeks or months.
- (b) A budgeted amount of lost time, and overtime, analysed by shops and departments, and in some cases further analysed as to cause – e.g. sickness, waiting time, etc.
- (c) Output expressed in some common term, such as value in production hours, tonnage, etc., or using short cut measures of value into stock.

This sort of information enables valuable data to be provided with the least possible delay. For example:

- (a) A record of overtime worked, leading to a weekly summary which may be compared with the budget, can be prepared daily – often it may need to be authorized before the overtime is worked. This does not mean that the works manager has to authorize it. He may have delegated this responsibility to his shop managers. On the other hand, he may have retained the responsibility for himself.

- (b) A weekly record of the number of employees – analysed by trade or grade for production departments – again compared with the budget.
- (c) A daily or weekly analysis of lost time, summarized weekly or monthly for comparison with the budget.
- (d) A cumulative daily record of tonnage delivered ex works may give a quick lead as to the sales figures.

The above information can be prepared quickly – daily information by 10 o'clock on the following day, or weekly information by the Monday of the following week – to give useful data on which the management can act, without waiting for wages to be calculated, or accounts prepared. It enables the manager responsible to take steps to remedy any adverse factors, so that when the monthly or four-weekly cost comparison statements are produced, he can report what he has already done to correct any over-expenditure. It is important that information is available on current operations – rather than historical records.

Revision of budget

Budgets should only be changed when actual practice has departed materially from the budget. Minor variations can either be reflected as variances, or else a lump-sum adjustment can be made to the budgeted figures. Every six months, however, the budget should be reviewed in detail, to see if a revised budget is necessary. In most cases only the budget for the current year need be amended, and those for subsequent years can be left until the detailed budget for the next year – and the broader budgets for subsequent years – are prepared. However, in some cases it may be advisable to prepare a detailed budget – and broader budgets for subsequent years – every six months. The budgets for future years will probably change considerably from year to year – this is only to be expected.

Changes should only be made in the budget when significant changes of policy are introduced. The fact that actual results have departed from budget should not necessarily lead to a change in the budget.

Cost comparison statements

At appropriate intervals – in most cases monthly or four-weekly – statements comparing budgets with actual expenditure should be prepared. A straightforward comparison of budgeted and actual expenses for the period may suffice, but the information can be made more useful if the difference between budget and actual expense can be analysed between:

- (a) output in the period being higher or lower than budget;
- (b) changes in wage rates since the budget was prepared;
- (c) other changes due to an increase or drop in efficiency;

(d) sales mix and price level changes;

(e) material cost changes;

and the degree of analysis depends on the information available – for example, if production can be expressed in terms of allowed hours. An example is given as Appendix 1.

The statement is prepared for the person responsible for controlling the expenditure covered by the report. For purely budgetary control purposes, the allocated expenses would be omitted from the statement since these items of expenditure are not the responsibility of the departmental manager. They have been included in the example since the document could also be used for costing purposes to obtain departmental labour and overhead rates.

The overhead expenses have been divided into only two categories:

Fixed – which means that the expenditure does not change with any likely change in levels of output;

Variable – which means that the expenditure changes according to changes in the level of output.

For simple budgetary control these two classifications are probably enough – although it should be realized that even fixed expenses will vary if the actual output were significantly more or less than budget. And variable expenses do not usually vary directly with the output.

Not all departments would require as detailed a statement as at Appendix 1. Appendix 2 sets out a cost comparison statement for the office manager, who would be responsible to whoever was responsible for the administrative expenditure budget. In the office manager's case, expenditure is not tied to production and the amount incurred from period to period may vary considerably. In this case, therefore, it is the cumulative figures which are of greater interest.

Authorization of expenditure

Budgetary control serves another purpose. It provides a mechanism whereby expenditure can be authorized formally by the board of directors.

Before the start of a financial year, the complete budget – covering future years as well as the detailed plan for the coming year – should be put to the board of directors for approval. It is important that the future years' budgets should be submitted, since any change in them could affect the plan for the coming year, particularly the proposed capital expenditure. Conversely, the effect of any capital expenditure proposals should be reflected in the operational budgets for subsequent years.

Approval of the budgets usually falls into two categories:

(a) For operational budgets, it is the level of expenditure which is approved. In other words, the budgeted amount of expenditure is related to a budgeted amount of production or sales. If the actual production or sales are less than the budgeted amount, the authorization of expenditure of variable costs is correspondingly less. If the production or sales are greater than the budgeted amount, the authorized expenditure of variable costs is greater.

It is, of course, quite possible that production could be greater than budget, while sales are less, or vice versa. In either case the stock levels will differ from the budgeted level.

Research and development budgets and the administration budget are frequently fixed in amount.

(b) for capital budgets, it is the specific amounts which are approved. Moreover, in many cases approval in this case may constitute approval in principle only, and specific authority may later be required before an order is placed. This is referred to under 'Capital budget' below.

At the board level, approval of the operational, administration and research and development budgets, constitutes authority for the general manager – or managing director – to incur expenditure within the level budgeted. Frequently the manager has powers to authorize further expenditure up to a stated amount without reference back to the board. The manager should then proceed with the further delegation down the line.

Capital budget

The capital budget serves a different purpose. In the first place, it should cover a period of longer than one year, and it serves only to set out a proposed capital programme.

Often, approval by the board constitutes approval in principle only, and specific authority is required before the purchase is made. Alternatively, approval of the capital budget may constitute authority to the managing director to proceed as he thinks fit. Or perhaps a compromise whereby purchases over a certain amount are referred to the board for specific approval, while the managing director has authority to authorize other expenditure – provided it is covered by the budget. In any case a sum to cover minor capital expenditure is usually included in the budget and the managing director is authorized to spend up to that sum. However, all capital expenditure should either be covered by the budget or else specifically submitted for board approval before it is incurred. Board approval constitutes an amendment to the budget.

Capital expenditure reports should normally be made at most monthly, but in some cases quarterly reports will suffice. Apart from reporting the actual expenditure, a re-estimate should be made of:

(a) the completed cost;

(b) the completion date;

by the person responsible for the expenditure. Appendix 3 is an illustration of a capital expenditure progress report.

The cash budget should, like all budgets, be prepared for a year ahead in detail, and for from three to five years on a broader basis. This budget should, however, be amended monthly, for the current year, and the detailed forecasts extended every six months.

Once all the budgets were prepared, it would be possible to draw up a budgeted balance sheet for each period of the year – and again on broader terms – for further years. These budgets, however, are outside the scope of this particular paper.

The introduction of budgetary control requires careful thought to ensure that the system is tailored to the needs of the individual company. If control is to be effective, those responsible for expenditure must believe that the targets are realistic and it is therefore important that all levels of management should contribute to the preparation of them and agree to the targets set. In this way budgetary control becomes a matter of teamwork rather than a control exercised from above.

Some Aspects of the Corporation Tax – II

by L. H. CLARK, F.C.A.

Groups of companies

ONE of the disappointing omissions from the 1965 legislation was the right to 'group' the profits and losses of parent and subsidiaries for assessment to corporation tax as there had been previously for profits tax purposes. Reliance must now be placed wholly on subvention payments, if relief is to be obtained for the losses of one company in a group against the profits of another. Practical experience of the way in which section 20, Finance Act 1953, has operated in the past has shown that there are pitfalls in the way of establishing title to this form of relief, and that the Revenue are not disposed to deviate from the strict interpretation of the law as they see it. Some special aspects of subvention payments in present circumstances are dealt with later.

An acknowledgement of the realities of group structure is shown by the procedure offered in section 48 (3), whereby dividends (but not other forms of distribution) may be paid by a subsidiary to its parent without the deduction of income tax, and without incurring a Schedule F liability. Such dividends arrive at the parent company under the label of 'group income', and naturally, they are not available to 'frank' the parent's own distributions. There must be few cases where the election which is necessary in order to take advantage of this facility has not already been made, since it is permissive in character, and nothing can be lost by establishing the right as early as possible.

This is not to say that subsidiaries' dividends should be paid gross indiscriminately. If a subsidiary is in receipt of franked investment income, its dividends are to that extent exempt from Schedule F tax in any event, and to pay all of them gross would merely be to deprive the parent of the ability to 'frank' a corresponding portion of its own dividends. It would seem to be a good policy, in the absence of other considerations, for subsidiaries to declare a dividend to be paid net (in addition to any gross dividends that may be required of it) on or shortly before April 5th in each year, equivalent to the franked investment income it has received since the previous April 5th.

The ability to make payments gross of income tax applies equally to interest and other sums which rank as charges on income, when paid by a subsidiary to its parent, or to a fellow-subsidiary (including payments made by an intermediate holding company to its subsidiary). This facility does not apply, however, to payments of interest etc. made by the ultimate parent company to any other member of the group. It is difficult to perceive the logic of this restriction, but it probably stems from the fact that the provision as to charges on income was grafted on to section 48 when in its original form it provided only for dividends to be paid gross, and dividends flowing from a parent to a subsidiary would be something of a rarity.<sup>1</sup>

The non-trading parent of one or more trading subsidiaries may need to exercise a little ingenuity if it is not to be deprived of tax relief for its outgoings, such as management expenses or debenture interest. If it has sufficient profits chargeable to corporation tax, such as unfranked investment income, this will provide the means of relief, although if the income is derived from an overseas source, any foreign tax credit will operate to diminish the relief for expenses. Similarly, if it has a sufficient surplus of franked investment income derived from outside the group, section 62 may afford the necessary relief, in the form of a repayment of income tax. It would patently be unwise to create a surplus of franked investment income for this purpose from within the group, i.e. by receiving dividends from subsidiaries net when they may be received gross, since the parent's income tax repayment would merely be coming out of its own pocket.

In the absence of these circumstances, it seems desirable that means should be found of charging to the subsidiaries amounts equal to the parent's outgoings, in such a way that these sums rank as deductions from the subsidiaries' profits chargeable to corporation tax. If the parent performs management or other services for the subsidiaries, these may be charged out to the latter at cost, or with a reasonable profit margin, but this would be unlikely to provide a sufficient surplus to cover, say, the interest on a substantial loan stock issue carried by the parent.

One might place some reliance on annual subvention payments made by the subsidiaries, since the parent will have a recurring deficit for that purpose in the circumstances envisaged. If, however, there should be a year when the subsidiaries' corporation tax profits are insufficient to cover the parent's outgoings, a subvention payment would not provide the means of recovering the deficiency in a later year. As will be discussed later, there are also transitional difficulties affecting accounting periods ending in 1966-67.

It will be more satisfactory if the parent can acquire from within the group a source of income of its own, chargeable to corporation tax, from which the expenses will rank as a deduction. It may be that a trade, or part of a trade, carried on by a subsidiary can be transferred, or investments yielding unfranked income. Alternatively, any finance provided by the parent for subsidiaries should be in the form of loans, rather than share capital, so that a flow of interest to the former may be produced, the interest ranking as a charge on income to the subsidiary paying it.

Before leaving the subject of groups of companies, mention might be made of the right of election contained in section 81 (4), whereby profits tax may be allowed to run for all sources of income right up to April 5th, 1966, notwithstanding that corporation tax has begun to be chargeable on trading profits before that date (or would be chargeable if profits were earned). This procedure will enable a concurrent trading loss to be used to reduce or extinguish a liability to profits tax on any unfranked income that may accrue up to April 5th, 1966. Where companies have been 'grouped' for profits tax purposes, it is not open to them to make this election under section 81 (4) individually. It is only the principal company that may do this, and if it does so, the election becomes effective for all the members of the profits tax group.

Subvention payments

The concept of subvention payments was introduced by the Finance Act 1953 (section 20) as a means of securing immediate relief in respect of losses incurred within a group of companies, against the income tax and profits tax which would otherwise be borne on profits concurrently earned by other members of the group. Its continuity of application, under corporation tax conditions, is provided for in Schedule 15, paragraph 20, but the transition may prove not to be entirely painless.

The first year for which profits and losses have to be computed for corporation tax purposes will normally have ended some time in 1965-66. To arrive at the subvention payment permissible for that accounting period, those computations are best disregarded. The surplus or deficit must be arrived at by applying strictly the formulae laid down in section 20 of the 1953 Act, and this involves recomputing the trading profit or loss, before capital allowances, as it would have appeared in a Case I income tax assessment for 1966-67, had income tax continued into that year. Capital allowances for 1965-66 (basis period, say, 1964), other statutory income and charges on income for 1965-66 (all in the income tax sense) are then introduced into the computation, as before. The subvention payment when determined is finally brought back to the corporation tax computations of the companies concerned as a trading receipt or payment. Should this result in a loss being balanced exactly against a profit, it should be regarded as coincidental. If, as is quite feasible, the profit-making company should end up with a loss, and vice versa, remember that the subvention payment itself may be voluntarily restricted so as to achieve a more logical result.

If this should be thought to be a quaint procedure, an even more esoteric exercise is to be performed in the following trading period – the one which starts in 1965-66 and ends in 1966-67. Here the computation of the surplus or deficit must be done in two parts – one for the period up to April 5th, 1966, and the other for the remaining period. These two figures must be aggregated (or netted) to form the surplus or deficit of each company for the entire period, and a subvention payment arrived at on this basis will be treated, as before, as a trading receipt or expense accruing on the last day of the full accounting period.

Again, the period up to April 5th, 1966, must be dealt with under the old rules, but since it will not be a full year, the Case I (income tax) profit or loss will be a proportion of that for the entire trading period. For the other elements of the computation, i.e. capital allowances, non-trading income, and charges, one must again look at 1965-66, and take a corresponding proportion of those figures, notwithstanding that they have been used once already in the previous year's subvention computation. This appears to be the combined effect of paragraph 10 (3) and 10 (4) of Schedule 15, Finance Act 1965, and section 20 (5), including the proviso, of the Finance Act 1953.

The strangeness of this procedure becomes even more apparent when one comes to deal with the second leg of the computation – the period from April 6th, 1966, up to the end of the accounting period. Here, the starting-point is the company's profit from all sources for corporation tax, for the whole accounting period, proportionately reduced on a time basis. There are certain adjustments to be made to the corporation tax profit, notably the inclusion of franked investment income, but not that received from other members of the group. Nothing is said as to whether the dividends to be included are those actually received between April 5th, 1966, and the end of the accounting period, or a proportion of those received in the whole year. A third possible interpretation is to take those received after April 5th, 1966, and to apportion them on a time basis as if they represented the income of the whole year. This could be justified on the grounds that what was received up to April 5th, 1966, cannot be franked investment income in the corporation tax sense.

Let us assume that the accounting period concerned is the year to December 31st, 1966. The capital allowances brought in for corporation tax will be those based on the events of that year, and three-quarters of them will enter into the 'second leg' of the subvention computation. The 'first leg', as we have seen, contains one-quarter of the capital allowances for which 1964 is the basis period. Somewhere en route, the capital allowances based on the year to December 31st, 1965, have become mislaid. They have, of course, been used in arriving at the corporation tax profit or loss for that accounting period, but for subvention purposes that computation is discarded entirely. To sum up, therefore, the capital allowances used to arrive at the subventions for the two consecutive years of trading, 1965 and 1966, will consist of:

$$\begin{aligned} & \frac{1}{4} \times 1965-66 \text{ income tax allowances (basis period, year to} \\ & \quad \text{December 31st, 1964).} \\ & \quad \circ \times \text{Corporation tax allowances for year to December 31st,} \\ & \quad \quad 1965 \\ & \quad \frac{3}{4} \times \text{Corporation tax allowances for year to December 31st,} \\ & \quad \quad 1966. \\ & \quad \underline{\quad} \\ & \quad \quad 2 \\ & \quad \underline{\quad} \end{aligned}$$

Similar anomalies will occur where non-trading income, taxed in 1965-66 on a preceding-year basis, has to be brought in to the calculations of surpluses or deficits for these two accounting periods.

Section 341 claims for 1965-66

The exclusion from subvention calculations of dividends received from subsidiaries and fellow-subsubsidiaries (whether they consist of franked investment income or group income) is of some long-term significance. A parent company which trades at a loss will henceforth be capable of receiving a subvention, whereas formerly the receipt of dividends from the subsidiaries was generally sufficient to turn the deficit into a surplus. Its remedy, up to 1964-65, was, of course, to make a claim for repayment of income tax in respect of the loss under section 341, Income Tax Act 1952, coupled, perhaps, with an election for group treatment for profits tax. I have said '1964-65' and not '1965-66' deliberately, because there is a distinct possibility that in the latter year the company will come away empty-handed. For the reason explained, it will probably not yet be able to establish a deficit and receive a subvention. On the other hand, when it comes to make its section 341 claim for 1965-66, it may find that the prohibition which appears at the end of paragraph 20 (1), Schedule 15, has eliminated or severely reduced the loss upon which the claim was to have been founded. The loss is to be computed without regard to capital allowances, and this will apply to all companies claiming under section 341 in 1965-66.

The right to use capital allowances to create or augment a trading loss for section 341 purposes was first established in section 20, Finance Act 1954. This was modified, generally to the taxpayers' advantage, by section 18, Finance Act 1962, which permitted the capital allowances for the year of assessment following the loss to be so used. Herein lies the difficulty. No company will have a 'year of assessment' following 1965-66, at least none to which capital allowances can be attributed. Perhaps with a little ingenuity a just solution to this problem could have been devised, but the Revenue draftsmen have preferred one which is brutally short and simple. Paragraph 20 (1) provides that in relation to claims for losses sustained after 1964-65, section 20, Finance Act 1954, is not to apply, and that must mean the section as amended by section 18, Finance Act 1962.

Sub-paragraph (2) of paragraph 20 appears at first sight to contradict this direction. In speaking of a loss in respect of which a company is entitled to claim relief in 1965-66, it adds, in parenthesis, the words 'including any amount treated as a loss under section 20 of the Finance Act 1954'. This apparent conflict with sub-paragraph (1) can be resolved by assuming that the words in parenthesis apply only to a loss sustained in 1964-65 (to which capital allowances can still be added), which is being used to support a section 341 claim in 1965-66 because of an absence or insufficiency of statutory income in the earlier year. If any confirmation is needed, that a loss sustained in 1965-66 may not be created or augmented by capital allowances, it is to be found in the Inland Revenue's explanatory booklet on the corporation tax, page 69.

Participators and associates -

'... Old Uncle Tom Cobleigh and all'

The attributing to a participator of the rights and powers of relatives and others, for the purpose of determining control of a company, may load him with a burden at least as unwelcome as that borne by the ill-used mare in the Devonshire fable. It seems on the whole unlikely that that particular enterprise was under the control, in any natural sense of the word, of any of the various participators, either severally or collectively, but the Revenue would undoubtedly advance the argument, if all else failed, that whether or not control was vested in Mr Brewer and his companions, the venture was technically under the control of a certain Mr

Pearse, by virtue of paragraphs 3 and 4 of Schedule 18. One may deduce from the opening lines of the ballad that this unfortunate gentleman was a loan creditor for capital assets, seemingly the only capital asset, acquired by the enterprise, and there is little doubt that he was entitled to the greater part of this asset (such as it was) on a winding-up. That a winding-up did eventually take place is recorded in the legend; regrettably Mr Pearse seems to have derived little consolation from it.

It is not recorded whether Mr Cobleigh was in fact the uncle of any of the other participants. An uncle is not strictly within the Table of Kindred and Affinity set out in Schedule 18, paragraph 5, but the nexus would have been established by the presence of his brother or sister, the parent of his nephew, so that two of them would be associates of the third. In a similar way (bidding Widdicombe farewell) a participating grandfather will preserve a link between two or more cousins, his grandchildren, notwithstanding that unity of heart, mind or estate is notably absent between them. One of the side effects of the Finance Act 1965 may be a marked increase in the advocacy of euthanasia for the aged!

Party games in the dark

In many cases the information contained in a company's register of members will plainly reveal that it is a close company. In others it may not be so apparent, and an elaborate game containing some of the features of 'Happy Families' and some of 'Blind Man's Buff' may then have to be played out. As in other games which have recently become fashionable, a computer could conceivably prove useful for processing the data as it comes to light. The directors will presumably know who their associates and nominees are, and with whom they are associated and for whom they are nominees. It is difficult to escape the conclusion that directors are under an obligation to disclose this information, and this again will in many cases settle the matter.

If it does not, how much further should the search be continued, and on whom does the onus of making these inquiries rest? Members who are strangers to the Board (and even those who are not) may be loath to reveal whether other members are relatives of theirs or are associated with them in some other way - whether the shares registered in their name are held by them as trustees, and if so who the beneficiaries are or who is or was the settlor. There seems to be no compulsion on them to divulge this information to the company, so how can the company be obliged to provide it? The Inland Revenue have certain limited powers imported from the Income Tax Act 1952, to require members of a company to disclose nominee holdings, but this is only one minor aspect of the problem. They may have recourse to their own files on the affairs of individual participators as taxpayers, but to what extent are they entitled to make use of this information, let alone reveal it to the company concerned? Is it possible that a company may one day go to appeal, protesting that there is no evidence to suggest that it is a close company, and be faced with this submission by the Revenue representatives - 'Our files show clearly that this is a close company, but my obligation of secrecy forbids me to disclose this information to the appellant, to you, the Commissioners, or to anyone else?' Bearing in mind that the onus of proof to displace an assessment rests normally on the appellant, what is the attitude of the Commissioners likely to be?

An even more horrifying prospect may arise if a practising accountant is asked by an Inspector of Taxes for particulars of a client company, with a view to establishing whether it is a close company or not. The accountant's knowledge of the affairs of members of the company, as personal clients of his, may provide the key to the whole situation, and yet these facts may be outside the knowledge of the company's directors (or so they may profess).

What should the accountant's duty be? To pass on to the inspector, without comment, particulars furnished by the company, knowing them to be incomplete and misleading, albeit unintentionally, in a material respect? To ask the company to reply direct to the inspector – a course which would probably arouse the former's resentment and the latter's suspicions? Or to try to find some means of putting the company and the Revenue in possession of the facts, without breach of professional confidence?

Whether or not these predicaments actually arise, certain conclusions may be drawn from the possibility that they may arise. If it is accepted as right that in taxing companies the Legislature should be more horrid to some than to others, then surely some more rational and positive test ought to be applied for separating the sheep from the goats. The mixture which the authors of the Finance Act 1965 have distilled from the pre-existing company surtax and profits tax legislation may prove in the end to be as unpalatable to the physician as to the patient.

Directors' remuneration

In deciding whether a person is a whole-time service director, it will no longer be sufficient, as it was for profits tax, to see whether his holding of ordinary share capital alone exceeds 5 per cent. The holdings of his associates must be aggregated with his own, to see whether this percentage is exceeded (Schedule 18, paragraph 6 (3)). To take a somewhat startling example, if there are three brothers serving a company full time as directors, each owning 2 per cent of the ordinary shares, none of them will be a whole-time service director, since each, with his associates, owns 6 per cent.

However, it is not by any means certain that the draftsman of this paragraph has fully achieved his objective. Consider the position of A, a full-time director, who owns no ordinary capital, but whose father, B, owns 10 per cent. It is surely a misuse of language to say that A 'with' B is the beneficial owner of more than 5 per cent, when it is apparent that B without A exercises all rights of ownership. If this argument is valid, may it not be extended to preserve A's position where A owns 4 per cent and B 6 per cent?

Section 74 imposes limits on the amount of directors' remuneration which may be deducted from a close company's profits in computing corporation tax, but relaxes those limits where there are at least two full-time directors (other than whole-time service directors). When subsection (2) is studied closely, it will be seen that part-time directors are apparently left out in the cold, if their remuneration brings the total above £4,000. The higher limits of £7,000, £12,000 and £13,000, permitted when there are two, three, and more than three full-time directors, are themselves limited to 'the aggregate remuneration . . . of those directors'. Thus, full-timers X and Y, although entitled to take £7,000 between them (but so that no more than £4,000 goes to either one of them), may restrict their remuneration to, say, £2,000 each. Notwithstanding this self-denial, the remuneration of Z, a part-time director, is disallowable, however small it might be. A similar situation existed under profits tax, but because of the lower rate of that tax the hardship would not have been so great.

The limitation on directors' remuneration by reference to fixed amounts may be displaced by a higher one calculated at 15 per cent of the company's profits for the accounting period concerned. 'Profits' are defined in section 46 (5) (b) as meaning 'income and chargeable gains'. It is nowhere explicitly stated that charges on income are to be deducted in arriving at 'profits' for the purpose of section 74, but a cautious approach to this apparent loophole is advised. The definition of profits in section 46 (5) (b) is prefaced by the words 'unless the context otherwise requires', and this at any rate leaves certain room for argument.

Section 74 (1) specifies the adjustments that are to be made to the profits before they can be used for calculating the 15 per cent. The directors' remuneration itself (apart from that of whole-time service directors) is not to be deducted, nor are investment allowances; and franked investment income received from other companies, excluding companies within the same group, is to be added. At this point it should be noted that it is franked investment income in the corporation tax sense that is referred to, i.e. distributions received after April 5th, 1966.

As an alternative, the average profits of the three years preceding the accounting period may be taken as the basis, and the proviso to section 74 (1) goes on to direct that where the averaging period begins before April 6th, 1966, profits chargeable to, and as computed for, profits tax are to be brought into the computation, including franked investment income in the profits tax sense (but again leaving out what is received from within the group). There is no explicit instruction to add back directors' remuneration and investment allowances to a profits tax chargeable profit for this purpose, although it is just possible to deduce this meaning from the words 'brought into computation', if they mean the beginning of the computation, before the specified adjustments are made. The Inland Revenue have confirmed, in response to an inquiry by the Institute, that this is the view they take.

If in the case of an established trading company the relevant three years are those, say, to December 31st, 1966, the sum to be averaged will often be found to consist of several diverse elements, viz.:

- (a) Profits tax chargeable profit (after adjustment).
- (b) Profits tax franked investment income (non-group).

1965:

- (c) Profits tax chargeable profit, if any (e.g. unfranked investment income).
- (d) Profits tax franked investment income (non-group).
- (e) Corporation tax profits (after adjustment).

- (f) Profits tax chargeable profit, if any, to April 5th, 1966.
- (g) Profits tax franked investment income (non-group) to April 5th, 1966.
- (h) Corporation tax profits (after adjustment).
- (i) Corporation tax franked investment income (non-group) from April 6th, 1966.

The absence of any profit actually chargeable to profits tax will not prevent the inclusion of profits tax franked investment income for any period forming part of the three years.

Returning to the case where the maximum remuneration is calculated at 15 per cent of the profits of the same accounting period, one can find no authority in section 74 for bringing in profits tax figures, where the relevant accounting period begins before April 6th, 1966. In dealing with 1965 alone, therefore, it seems that only (e) above enters into the calculation, and similarly, for 1966, only (h) and (i) will be included.

Disallowance of interest paid to a director

A close company must treat as a distribution any interest paid to a director, unless he is a whole-time service director or is not a participator, or to an associate of such a director. The effect of this is that the company is denied relief from corporation tax for such interest. There is a similar denial of relief where rent or royalty is paid to a participator, but if it is paid for the use of tangible property or a copyright, the disallowance is limited to the excess over what is to be regarded as a reasonable commercial consideration for that use.

If a close company is looking to a director or one of his associates to finance the purchase by the company of a fixed asset, such as land, buildings, plant or machinery, it would do well to avoid receiving an interest-bearing loan for this purpose. If, instead, the director or associate were to purchase the asset himself, and rent it to the company, a reasonable rent will rank as deduction for corporation tax, whereas the interest would not.

When is a subsidiary a close company?

Any subsidiary must fall within the primary definition of a close company, since it is necessarily under the control of one person, i.e. its parent. However, paragraph 1 (4) of Schedule 18 purports to exempt from the close company category a subsidiary of an 'open' company, and likewise a company which is controlled by two or more 'open' companies. The sub-paragraph is tortuously worded as follows:

'(4) A company is not to be treated as a close company in any case where:

'(a) by reason of beneficial ownership of shares in the company the control of it is in the hands of a company which is not a close company or of two or more companies none of which is a close company; and

'(b) it could only be treated as a close company as being under the control of five or fewer participators, and it cannot be so treated except by taking as one of the participators a company which is not a close company;

but so that references in this sub-paragraph to a close company shall be construed as applying to any company which, if resident in the United Kingdom, would be a close company.'

Those who have not yet underlined the 'and' which connects (a) and (b) in this sub-paragraph should do so now, before tears are needlessly shed. Both conditions must be complied with, otherwise the company remains 'close'.

Before one can begin to understand why the exemption is restricted in this way it is necessary to appreciate that a company can be controlled by one person or set of persons in one manner, and by a different set of persons in another. For example, a company is deemed to be under the control of an 'open' company which owns sufficient preference or non-voting shares to give it the right to the greater part of the income or the greater part of the assets if distributed. It would also be under the control of an individual who owned the preponderance of the voting capital. In circumstances of this sort, it is hardly surprising that the legislation should ensure that the company concerned is not taken out of the 'close' category.

Further examination of paragraph 1 (4) shows that the exemption of a subsidiary from close company status does not apply where:

- (a) the controlling company or companies do not own the shares beneficially, e.g. where they own as nominees or trustees; or
- (b) the directors may be said to have control, by applying any of the prescribed tests of control; or
- (c) any five or fewer participators, other than 'open' companies have control, by applying any of those tests.

It will be seen from (b) that if the parent company happens to be a director of its subsidiary, the latter must always be a close company. Even if the parent has not formally appointed itself a director, can it escape from the expanded definition of 'director' contained in paragraph 6? This includes 'any person in accordance with whose directions and instructions the directors are accustomed to act', also a person who is concerned in the management of the company's trade or business, is remunerated out of the funds of that trade or business (e.g. receives management charges), and owns or controls at least 20 per cent of the company's ordinary share capital.

It would seem also from (c) above that where a company is exempted under paragraph 1 (3) from close company status only by virtue of a 35 per cent public holding of its voting shares, its subsidiaries are not themselves automatically exempted. The parent will be under the control of five or fewer participators, otherwise there would be no need for it to have recourse to paragraph 1 (3), and there is nothing in that sub-paragraph which alters the fact. Those five or fewer persons will also be held to control the subsidiaries (see paragraph 3 (4)). They may also be participators in one or more of the subsidiaries, for example, if they owned any shares directly or were loan creditors of the subsidiaries, however small were the sums involved. In these circumstances the prohibition contained in paragraph 1 (4) (b) would operate, and the subsidiaries concerned would remain close companies.

It is perhaps unlikely that the draftsmen of Schedule 18 intended the exemption of subsidiaries from close company status to be restricted in the ways indicated above, and for that reason the Revenue may not be disposed to enforce too rigorous an interpretation. Nevertheless, until there is some legislative amendment, there may well be cause for uneasiness among some groups which are relying on the status of the parent company for their escape from the close company provisions.

The United Kingdom subsidiaries of overseas companies may also find themselves in an unenviable position. They can be 'open' companies only if their non-resident parents would be 'open' companies if they were resident in the United Kingdom. In applying one of the tests of 'openness' – public ownership of 35 per cent of the voting capital – one is restricted to shares quoted on a 'recognized' stock exchange, and recognition does not extend beyond the exchanges of the United Kingdom, as far as the Finance Act 1965 goes. If one is to pretend that a foreign company resides in the United Kingdom, surely the pretence should be carried a stage further, so as to regard its overseas quotation as if it were a domestic one. This is an illogicality which is acknowledged in the new Double Taxation Agreement with the United States, in which it is provided that certain registered American stock exchanges are to be 'recognized' for the purposes of the close company definition. It is to be hoped that supplemental agreements with other countries will follow this pattern, but a suitable relaxation of the requirements of Schedule 18 would be a preferable solution.

Two points of view

By the time this paper is presented, it will be known what amendments, if any, are to be made by the Finance Bill of 1966, in clarification of the 1965 legislation. I say 'if any'

because it would surely be presumptuous to suggest that any will be necessary, after hearing the reassurance given to Parliament by one of the Government spokesmen, Sir Eric Fletcher, during the Committee stage of the 1965 Bill:

'I think that by most connoisseurs of Parliamentary draftsmanship the Bill would be regarded as a masterpiece of eloquence and lucidity. . . . It only requires an elementary amount of attention to its Clauses for anyone to realize that it is couched in the simplest and clearest possible language.'

There were some who did not share Sir Eric's sentiments. Perhaps the harassed professional accountant would find himself more in sympathy with the picturesque language used by Mr Patrick Jenkin, the Member for Wanstead and Woodford, who, in moving the five hundredth out of the seven hundred and fifty or so amendments to the Bill which had then been tabled, uttered this anguished cry:

'This is a most ramshackle Bill. It will end up like the Irishman's waistcoat – seven new backs and nine new fronts – or like the Chinaman's axe – six new handles and five new heads.'

It is to be hoped that if the axe-head is to be renewed once more, its blade will be sharp enough to cut away some of the complexities and obscurities, which are apparent to the members of this profession, if not to the authors of this 'masterpiece of lucidity'.

defeat a take-over bid. One of the transactions was the capitalization of some of the reserves and the application of the resulting sum in paying up ordinary shares which were allotted to the shareholders, among whom were the respondents.

The Inland Revenue served on the taxpayers counter-acting notices under section 28 of the Finance Act 1960, contending that that particular transaction had as its main object, or one of its main objects, to enable the shareholders to obtain a tax advantage. It was contended for the taxpayers that the only purpose of the transaction was to defeat a take-over bid. The Special Commissioners decided in favour of the taxpayers.

Held: the Special Commissioners' decision was correct.

Income tax – Back duty – Omissions to disclose full profits – Some omitted profits substantial – Explanations changed – Whether wilful default – Income Tax Act 1952, section 47 (1).

The appellant omitted to disclose her full profits on more than one occasion, and she had changed her explanations as to the reasons for non-disclosure. On some occasions substantial receipts were not disclosed. The General Commissioners decided that there was wilful default on the part of the taxpayer. In the Court of Session it was contended for the Revenue that wilful default could be established by the Revenue by raising a presumption of guilt and thus leaving the taxpayer to rebut the presumption.

Held: the General Commissioners were entitled to conclude as they had done; but that the onus of proving wilful default was put by section 47 on the Revenue; and that as there was a dispute on the figures, the case should be remitted to the General Commissioners for further consideration.

Peate v. Australia Commissioner of Taxation

In the Privy Council – May 17th, 1966

(Before Viscount DILHORNE, Lord MORRIS OF BORTH-Y-GEST, Lord PEARCE, Lord DONOVAN and Lord PEARSON)

Income tax – Avoidance – Arrangements having that purpose or effect – Medical partnership dissolved – Group company and subsidiary companies formed – Agreement to serve subsidiary company at a salary – Agreement to serve – Services let to group company – Whether association of persons in receipt of income jointly – Whether arrangements void for tax purposes – Amount of income assessable – Income Tax and Social Services Contribution Assessments Act 1936–60, sections 6, 17, 19, 166, 260; Finance Act 1960, section 28.

From 1954 to the middle of 1956 the taxpayer, a medical practitioner, was in partnership with other doctors, and he was entitled to 14 per cent of the profits. On June 29th, 1956, the partners formed a company, Westbank Ltd, and each partner became a director of that company. The partnership, then composed of eight doctors, was dissolved on August 31st, 1956, and on the same day eight other companies were formed, one for each of the eight doctors, who each became the governing director of his company. The shares in the taxpayer's company, Raleigh Ltd, were allotted to trustees for his infant children. One of the objects of Raleigh was to provide medical services.

On September 1st, 1956, the taxpayer sold his practice to Raleigh, and entered into a service agreement with that company at a salary. The taxpayer's wife became the secretary of Raleigh, also at a salary. On the same day there was an agreement between the taxpayer, Westbank and Raleigh, whereby the taxpayer's services were made available by Raleigh to Westbank, and whereby a fee equal to 14 per cent of the income of Westbank (after deducting certain expenses) became payable by that company to Raleigh. Similar agreements were made in the other seven cases.

In 1959 one of the doctors withdrew from the scheme, and consequently the fee payable by Westbank to Raleigh (and to each of the other six companies) increased, and there was another increase in 1960. In his return for the year of assessment ended June 30th, 1957, the taxpayer included his share of the partnership profits up to August 31st and for the rest of that year the salary he had received from Raleigh. The assessment for that year was computed accordingly. The return for the next year of assessment showed a salary of £1,560 as the only professional income. The respondent assessed the taxpayer, however, on the footing that the arrangements with Westbank and Raleigh had been made void by section 260 of the Income Tax and Social Services Contribution Act 1936 and 1960, and that he was still a member of the partnership and was entitled to £4,298 as his share of the partnership income for that year. The assessments for the two following fiscal years were made on the same basis. The taxpayer appealed against the three assessments.

Held (Lord Donovan dissenting as to part of the decision): (1) the arrangements were rendered void for tax purposes by section 260; (2) the taxpayer was assessable on the income he would have received if the arrangements had not been made; (3) the respondent was entitled to treat the partnership as having existed until the day in 1959, when one of the doctors withdrew from the scheme; (4) thereafter there was 'an association of persons . . . in receipt of income jointly' within section 6 of the Act, and the taxpayer was assessable on the shares of profits paid to Raleigh.

Kilmarnock Equitable Co-operative Society Ltd v. C.I.R.

In the Court of Session

Income tax – Capital allowances – Building for screening and packing coal in paper bags – Some coal sold wholesale and some in Society's shops – Whether industrial building or structure – Income Tax Act 1952, section 271 (1) (c), (2), (3).

The Society, carrying on the business of selling coal, owned a depot and erected there a separate building to house machinery for screening the coal and packing it in paper bags. The Society's purpose in erecting the building was to develop a trade in packeted coal and also to provide such coal for sale in the Society's own shops, of which it had about thirty. The Society's hopes of developing a substantial wholesale business in this field had not yet been fully realized, and it sold much more coal retail than it did wholesale.

It was contended for the Society that the building was an industrial building because it was in use for the purposes of a trade consisting in the subjection of the coal to a process of being cleaned and then packed in small paper bags, and it was therefore within section 271 (1) (c) of the Income Tax Act 1952. It was conceded for the Revenue that what went on in the building was a process; but it was contended that there was no subjection to a process, because no alteration was made in the nature of the material itself. It was also contended that the building was used for a purpose ancillary to the purposes of a retail shop and was therefore not an industrial building because of section 271 (3). The General Commissioners decided in favour of the Revenue.

Held: the building satisfied section 271 (1) (c); and that it was not in use for any purpose ancillary to the purposes of any retail shop.

Integration of Accountancy Bodies

PROPOSALS for the integration of the Australian Society of Accountants and the Australasian Institute of Cost Accountants have recently been agreed by the General Councils and Divisional Councils of the two bodies. This is a development from the affiliation scheme between the two bodies in 1956 as it is believed that the stage has now been reached for the affiliation to progress to a complete merger of identities.

Under the scheme, all rights of present members for advancement in status up to fellowship are preserved in accordance with the present articles of the Society and the Institute.

Associate membership of the Society (A.A.S.A.) will continue to be the basic qualification, with the addition of a new grade of membership to be described as Senior Associate - A.A.S.A. (Senior). This category is to be created for two purposes: to recognize the additional academic qualification of members of the Institute (Associates of which will become Senior Associates of the Society) and to provide in the membership structure advanced qualifications over those required for basic membership.

The General Council of the Society is also to establish other areas of post-qualification study - particularly in the field of management accounting - suitable for similar academic qualifications, in order to provide for advancement to the new grade of Senior Associate.

It is felt that apart from further unifying the profession and simplifying administration, the new integrated body will facilitate the interchange of ideas and experience between accountants with common interests and will provide all members with greater opportunities to benefit from association with accountants in fields other than their own.

NEW ZEALAND

Ombudsman's Annual Report

THERE was now widespread overseas interest in the general conception of an Ombudsman to help the citizen in a complex society to secure justice in his dealings with administration, states the annual report of the New Zealand Ombudsman. Inquiries had come from many countries including Britain, Italy, Canada, the United States, India and Australia, and Bills to set up Ombudsman-like offices were now before several Canadian provincial Parliaments. The United Kingdom Bill bore marked similarity to the New Zealand Act, but was more restricted in scope.

The report states that the number of cases received in the past year in New Zealand had dropped, but there had been an increase in the number of difficult and prolonged investigations. The Ombudsman's office received 685 cases during the year ended March 31st, 1966. Of these, 604 were dealt with and 81 cases were still under consideration. Last year the office received 743 cases, 739 of which were dealt with and 4 were still under consideration. In some cases, says the report, lack of jurisdiction was apparent on the face of the complaint, but in a number, substantial investigations had to be carried out before the Ombudsman could determine that he had no jurisdiction to proceed further.

Of the total cases received for the year under review, 272 were fully investigated and 227 were considered not to be justified and 45 were found to be fully justified, compared with 55 for the previous year. The Ombudsman had to issue formal recommendations in twelve cases only. In many of the other cases the investigations were well advanced when remedial action was taken by the department or agency concerned. In the remainder, remedial action was taken quite quickly. The report adds that all the Ombudsman's formal recommendations were accepted and acted on by the relevant authorities.

Trade Union Accounting

ACCOUNTING for Trade Unions is the title of a new 'public service' brochure distributed recently by the Public Relations Committee of the New Zealand Society of Accountants.

This publication follows the spectacular success of the first brochure Accounting for Clubs, over six thousand copies of which have been distributed to small organizations and clubs throughout New Zealand. Copies of the new publication have been sent to every trade union in the country, eliciting the commendation of the Minister of Labour, the Hon. T. P. Shand.

The Society's Board of Research and Publications has now commenced work on a third brochure intended to assist lay investors in understanding published accounts. The Associated Stock Exchanges have announced support for the project, which will be completed later this year.

New Government Audit Certificate

THE New Zealand Government Audit Office proposes to use a new form of audit certificate, according to the annual report of the Controller and Auditor-General recently tabled in the House of Representatives. The change has been made, according to the Auditor-General, because the certificate previously used is no longer in keeping with modern practice.

The new form of certificate will precede the accounts concerned, and in the case of a major balance sheet, an unqualified report will take the following form:

'The Audit Office, acting under statutory authority, has audited the accounts of the (name of undertaking) for the year ended (balance date).

'The audit included such reviews of the accounting procedures and tests of the accounting records and other supporting evidence as were considered necessary in terms of section 20, Public Revenues Act 1953. All the information and explanations required have been obtained. The financial transactions which have come under notice have been within statutory authority.

'In the opinion of the Audit Office the attached balance sheet and accompanying accounts give a true and fair view of the state of affairs of the (name of undertaking) as at (balance date) and of the result of the financial operations for the year.'

Varied where appropriate, the report will also be introduced shortly in the case of local authority accounts.

AN Inter-American Congress on Higher Accountancy Teaching is to be held in Rio de Janeiro from September 14th to 20th to examine the position of accountancy in the light of present technological development and to consider the adaptation of teaching methods in the different fields of the profession. The Congress will be co-sponsored by the Accountants Association of Rio de Janeiro (Sindicato dos Contabilistas do Rio de Janeiro) - which this year celebrates the fiftieth anniversary of its foundation - and the Educational and Cultural Department of the Brazilian Government.

Among the topics to be discussed at the Congress will be accountancy didactics and the academic curriculum; operational research; management accounting; electronic data processing, and auditing procedures.

Accounting Jargon

THE Journal of Accountancy for June refers to an article by Mr Allen D. Choka in the April issue of the Public Relations Journal, denouncing accounting as a language of 'pure jargon . . . It may be words; it is hardly communication'. Mr Choka's errors are pointed out, such as his identification of 'retained earnings' with 'money available for growth'. The article merits careful consideration, says the Journal's editorial, as evidence of the problems which result from annual reports which are partly accounting documents and partly public relations vehicles. The tremendous recent additions to the number of shareholders add urgency to these problems.

The editorial agrees that there is no excuse for 'unnecessary thickets of accounting jargon'. Some device surely is needed to satisfy both the small shareholder and the investment sophisticate, though a false sense of security might result if the use of simple terms created the delusion that corporate affairs are simple. Perhaps if accounting followed the example of law and medicine by lapsing into Latin, both housewife and lawyer might accept it as the complex, highly technical presentation which it is.

Operational Auditing

MR JOSEPH W. DODWELL, C.P.A., writes in The Journal of Accountancy for June on the operational auditing concept as the bridge between a basic traditional financial audit and a management services approach to a client's problem. He emphasizes the continuing great significance and value of the traditional basic audit. Nevertheless he deprecates a situation where management often is more aware, or more perceptive, than the accounting profession in recognizing the values of quantitative and qualitative analysis for the broader areas of management's responsibilities.

In the future, writes Mr Dodwell, the accountant will no doubt have undergraduate courses in industrial engineering, production scheduling, marketing, and other functional areas, as part of his body of knowledge and training for an integrated approach to auditing. Such courses may well become mandatory for a C.P.A. certificate. The operational auditing approach must come on an evolutionary basis, because of the cost of retraining and refocusing the auditor's traditional objectives. He urges the profession to recognize the great opportunity offered by operational auditing in meeting the needs of business management.

The Accountant's Liability to Third Parties

REFERENCE is made in the Financial Executive (New York) for June, to some eighty lawsuits with more than $20 million in claims pending against public accounting firms across the country. Mr Robert M. Trueblood, C.P.A., President of the American Institute of Certified Public Accountants, is reported as advising the use of a disclaimer on accounting reports furnished to third parties, stating that responsibility is solely to the client who commissioned the report.

It is stated that the American firm of Peat, Marwick, Mitchell & Co requires companies for which it performs audits to make a covering statement that such examination of accounting records 'would not necessarily disclose irregularities, should any exist'. A senior partner in the firm is said to have suggested that the extensive publicity given to certain cases pending against the firm stimulates other parties to press claims.

Canadian Institute's Accounting Research Bulletins

MISS GERTRUDE MULCAHY, F.C.A., Research Associate of the Canadian Institute, tells in The Canadian Chartered Accountant for June, how the Research Committee, after beginning limited inquiries in 1964, is now writing to the auditors in all cases of apparent deviation, however slight, from recommendations of the accounting research bulletins in the published accounts of public companies.

Since January 1st last, letters have been written to the auditors of over one hundred and twenty-five companies. The replies have brought out many areas in which there are honest differences of opinion, and particular circumstances in which specific bulletin recommendations are not appropriate. Also, in some cases, changes in financial statements issued since the letter seem to show that increasing awareness of the recommendations has resulted.

Land Commission Bill

Institute Memorandum

The Council of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales submitted the following comments to the Ministry of Land and Natural Resources (now incorporated in the Ministry of Housing and Local Government) which arise on consideration of the Land Commission Bill (Bill 1) at present before Parliament. Certain of these comments although relating to the betterment levy will, if adopted, require consideration in relation to future Finance Bills.

[The memorandum is published as part of the proceedings of the meeting of the Council reported elsewhere in this issue.]

General

CLAUSE 42 of the 1965 Bill required the Commission, as soon as practicable after notification of a chargeable act or event, to serve notice on the person concerned either that no liability for levy would arise or that they would require further information. The present Bill contains no equivalent clearance procedure and the Council submits that the provisions of clause 42 should be reinstated.

Clause 51 – Interest on levy and payments on account

2. The tax treatment of interest on the levy is not clear. It is submitted that interest should be allowed as a charge for corporation tax, income tax and surtax.

Schedule 4 – General provisions for ascertaining factors relevant to assessment of levy

3. Schedule 4 provides for the calculation of the levy on the net development value, this being arrived at by deducting from the market value a base value (11/10ths of the current-use value) together with the amount of any consequent depreciation caused to other land of the grantor. Certain expenditure on improvements may be added to the base value. It is submitted that, in addition, costs incurred in making any valuation required for the purpose of the Act, should be allowed on the lines permitted under paragraph 4 of Schedule 6 of the Finance Act 1965 for expenditure in respect of assets and capital gains tax computations.

4. In regard to market value, it is submitted that the basis of its determination for the purpose of betterment levy should, wherever appropriate, be the same as that for capital gains tax.

Schedule 5 – Part I – Base value derived from previous disposition

5. It is submitted that the provisions of Part I of this schedule in relation to relevant dispositions should be extended to bona fide dispositions made in pursuance of arm's length contracts made within the period from September 23rd, 1965, to the first appointed day.

Schedule 9 – Part I – Close companies

6. Paragraph 2 provides that where a close company (as defined for the purposes of Part IV, Finance Act 1965) is liable to levy which remains unpaid for six months or more, the unpaid levy may be apportioned among the issued shares of the company, and any amount so apportioned recovered from the holder of that share. The Council strongly deplores this provision which negatives the concept of limited liability in such cases.

Capital gains tax

7. It is noted that paragraph 30 of the White Paper, The Land Commission (Cmd 2771), states that 'Development value will be excluded from capital gains for the purposes of capital gains tax on long-term gains or corporation tax', and that paragraph 149 of the Inland Revenue Booklet No. 500 (1966) on the capital gains tax indicates that the necessary amendments to Part III of the Finance Act 1965 will be contained in a subsequent Finance Act. In order to facilitate the settlement of tax liabilities, it is hoped that these amendments will be dealt with at an early date. The following points are submitted for consideration in the necessary amendments to Part III of the Finance Act 1965:

- (i) It is noted from Mr Diamond's reply to a question asked by Mr Boyd-Carpenter (Hansard, December 14th, 1965 (Col. 1067)) that the levy will not exclude the imposition of short-term capital gains tax on the realized development value on which it falls, but that the amount of levy paid will be allowed as an expense for the purposes of the short-term capital gains tax. Concern is expressed at the proposal that the levy should be treated as an expense. The Council considers that the principle of set-off of tax against tax should be followed.
- (ii) It should be made clear that where land is purchased net of levy by the Land Commission under clause 70 the transaction will be excluded from capital gains for the purpose of capital gains tax on long-term gains or corporation tax, in the same way as is proposed for sales to other persons.
- (iii) It is submitted that where there is a liability to the levy in respect of any transaction in relation to land, there should be a corresponding exemption from other direct taxes payable on any capital transaction in respect thereof at that time or in the future. For example, where property is leased at a premium there could be liability to the levy under Schedule 4, Part II and to income tax or corporation tax under section 22, Finance Act 1963.

Express Dairy

THE Express Dairy Co Ltd, from whose 1965-66 accounts this week's reprint comes, is getting 'image conscious'. The reprint shows, however, that the modern idiom has not, as yet, spread to account presentation. The accounts have a 'milk float' rather than an 'automated dairy, immediate delivery' look to them. They tend to appear as outmoded as the capital structure, which suggests a legacy of age in line with the eighty-seventh annual meeting at which they were presented.

This may seem stern criticism, but it is only so because the company is so intent on new development and new techniques in its operations. Express Dairy's biggest 'image' project at present is Longlife milk which the chairman, Mr William Bell, describes as 'the greatest advance in dairy technology since the introduction of pasteurization'.

It took nine years of research to develop the product and while the company was waiting for the Ministry to sanction sales in this country, foundations were laid for considerable export business, joint production arrangements overseas and successful sales with shipping companies.

Record sales

There seems little doubt that in Longlife milk and cream the Express Dairy has a source of potential sales and profits on a considerable scale. But Mr Bell in his review points to basic problems in the dairy industry which must predominate in the company's general operations. Group sales last year, as the 'Ten-year record' shows, were a peak £88.5 million; and trading profits of over £5 million, as well as 258 million gallons of milk handled, were also new records. Milk and milk products represent about 80 per cent of total sales.

Mr Bell, however, makes the point that maintenance of profits at home is at present only being achieved by the employment of more working capital - a point which might well have been brought out in a fuller ten-year record showing the trend of funds employed as well as profits.

Profits arising from increased efficiency and the absorption of more businesses are being swallowed by having to distribute milk without adequate operating margins. The company operates milk retailing under the control of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and unless either an adequate margin is granted, or different arrangements for distribution agreed, further earnings progress is going to be difficult.

Seven-day deliveries

The company's successful development of a shorter working week was thwarted last year when the Milk Industry and the Milk Distributive Wages Council decided to make compulsory a five-day working week while, at the same time, maintaining seven-day milk deliveries. For Express Dairy, which has introduced six-day deliveries, this meant recruitment of several thousand additional relief salesmen with resultant increases in distribution costs.

The company, Mr Bell says, feels very strongly that technological developments of the last twenty years justify the operation of a five-day week, by reducing the frequency of deliveries, without any additional cost of distribution. A recent market survey showed that 85 per cent of the company's customers would be 'quite happy to accept a reduction in deliveries'.

But all that the five-day week, plus seven-day deliveries, has meant is that the company, in common with its competitors, has been unable to recruit the necessary additional staff. A substantial proportion therefore are having to work on 'rest days' at overtime rates of pay, thus increasing distribution costs still further.

Surely these are points that could be brought out in figures in the annual report – the rising level of employed capital in the main dairy side of the group, the rise in distribution costs, the rising wage bill. These must be the basis on which the dairy industry makes its representations to the Ministry. It would surely not harm the industry's case, or an individual company's position, to translate Mr Bell's comments into hard figures.

Admittedly competition in the dairy industry is tough. Attempts to reduce the number of delivery days by one company could lead to housewives switching to another milkman. Groceries have to be carried on delivery trucks because 'the other milkman does', but the profit margin is minimal.

But if Express Dairy has a case for better margins – and it has – the company's accounts are one of the places in which to make it. A first move next year should be to separate dairy and dairy product sales and profits from those on the other sides of the group which include hotels and catering and account, it is understood, for about 20 per cent of group operations, although the report does not say so.

CITY NOTES

THE best that can be said for the stock-market is that at least the bear movement was temporarily halted after three weeks of headlong plunge. There is, however, only technical justification for an equity rally and the general forecast is for the bear trend to be resumed with the bottom probably around the 280 level in The Financial Times share index terms.

Naturally a fall of the size seen since this year's nearly all-time peak can be expected to bring in hopeful new buying, but the realistic view of the market must be for a further decline. Only voluntary selling has probably been seen so far.

It is not beyond the bounds of probability that, later in the year, there will be compulsory selling in order to raise funds that bank loans would normally cover. The banks, with no elbow room at all for covering tax payments lending, will have to exert a squeeze of unusual severity.

Further than that, the strength of the current round of deflationary measures has obviously not been felt industrially and has probably not been fully appreciated in investment terms. Any periodic rally in equities will be justified only on market technicalities, and rallies should be used for equity selling rather than buying.

THE farcical position over building society interest rates is something more than simply a matter of Governmental muddle. It should be seen in terms of the Government's housing policy. If building societies are not to be allowed to increase their interest rates then the movement's ability to finance new mortgages will be decidedly limited. Competitive interest rates make the building societies' 4 per cent tax paid interest to investors out of line with general interest rate conditions. Apart from that, if the wider margin aimed at by the projected increase in the lending rate is not to be allowed, there will be further cramping of the movement's lending ability. If mortgages are short then house building, already well below the Government's anticipated level, will decline severely. The Government cannot on one hand set a housing building target and on the other hand curb the building societies' ability to provide mortgage funds.

MAJOR industrial rationalization is seen in two current merger operations being arranged in the City. The Rolls-Royce company having virtually agreed merger terms with the Bristol Aeroplane company, which owns 50 per cent of Bristol Siddeley Engines, has arranged City finance for the purchase of the other 50 per cent from the Hawker Siddeley group. Lazard Brothers have made preliminary arrangements for a £20 million Rolls-Royce debenture issue to provide part of the consideration.

The other operation is in the machine tool industry where, in an £11 million operation, the Alfred Herbert group is taking over the machine tool interests of the Birmingham Small Arms company. Over the past year or so the machine tool industry has been virtually re-formed and tighter control of the industry in fewer industrial hands should prove to its longer term advantage.

Rationalization is also belatedly coming to the shipbuilding industry with John Brown, of Clydebank, talking with the Government financed Fairfield's company. This is the latest in a number of regional regroupings in the shipbuilding industry - or at least is the latest step towards regrouping. Meanwhile, the short-term problem of mounting losses on current contracts remains and it may mean the closure of more of the smaller yards in the industry.

Bye-laws 67 and 88

It was reported that the amendments to bye-laws 67 and 88 as approved by members on May 18th, 1966, had been allowed by the Lords of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council on August 2nd, 1966, and that the revised bye-laws were therefore now effective.

Land Commission Bill

The Council authorized the publication of a memorandum [reproduced on page 206] to the Minister of Land and Natural Resources commenting on certain matters arising from consideration of the Land Commission Bill.

Examination Results - May 1966

It was reported that the results of the examinations held in May 1966 were as follows:

	Pass	Fail	Total	Completing Final Exam.
Final (old syllabus) ..	860	940	1,800	860
Final (new syllabus)
Parts I & II together	4	9	13	4
Part I only	1,238*	1,136	2,374	—
Part II only	177	141	318	177

* Includes 19 candidates who sat for both Parts of the examination and passed in Part I only.

The names of the successful candidates and of those placed in order of merit and awarded prizes were published as a supplement to last week's issue of The Accountant.

Recruitment Committee

The Council decided that it would be in the interests of the profession for an assessment to be made now of the probable future demand for the services of members and the recruitment policies needed to meet those demands. It has accordingly formed a Committee for this purpose and in appointing the following members has taken into account the importance of ensuring that the needs of industry and commerce, together with those of the practising side of the profession, are fully considered:

Mr R. McNeil (Chairman)
Mr C. Croxton-Smith (Vice-Chairman)
Mr S. Edgcumbe
Mr R. W. Foad
Mr W. Hare
Mr K. J. Sharp
Mr R. G. Slack
Mr A. S. Watson
Mr F. J. Weeks
Mr B. E. Basden (co-opted)
Mr S. J. D. Corsan (co-opted)
Mr D'Agapeyeff (co-opted)
Mr A. Wilson (co-opted).

In addition to making an assessment of the probable future demand for the services of members and the likelihood that the present and probable intake will meet that demand, the Committee will also examine the extent of the present shortage of articled clerks and whether this is likely to increase or diminish in the foreseeable future; analyse the causes of the shortage and whether it is more acute in some parts of the country than in others; consider the remuneration paid in relation to alternative occupations open to potential recruits and generally consider whether present recruitment policies should be reappraised.

One Year Full-time Courses for Articled Clerks

The Council approved the following statement for publication:

As already announced, full-time courses for articled clerks for the academic year commencing in October 1966 are to be held at the following colleges of further education:

City of London College
Enfield College of Technology
Leeds College of Commerce
Liverpool College of Commerce.

Fifty vacancies are available at each college and for 1966-67 will be restricted to those clerks who have obtained two passes at the Advanced level in the General Certificate of Education examination and who satisfy the conditions for a reduction in service to four years. Applications for vacancies for articled clerks should be made by principals to the college concerned and may be on a provisional basis pending the publication of G.C.E. results later this year.

The syllabuses for the courses have been agreed with the four colleges. The curriculum will include the following:

Accounting, including Auditing
Structure and Organization of Business Economics Principles of English Law
Mathematics, Statistics and Analysis Techniques.

Formal allowance of new bye-law 88 (c) has been received. The Council wishes it to be known that it is its intention to exercise its powers under this bye-law so that an articled clerk who has completed one of the courses to the satisfaction of the college and who has passed the approved examination at the end thereof will be eligible to claim exemption from the Intermediate examination.

Allowance of the alteration to bye-law 67 has also been received. The effect of this alteration is to increase from nine months to twelve months the maximum study leave for articled clerks who, by successful attendance at these full-time courses, obtain exemption from the Intermediate examination. These clerks, having spent about nine of the twelve months on the course, will thus have a maximum of about three months' study leave still available. Out of this, they will be entitled to four consecutive weeks before presenting themselves for the first time for each of Parts I and II of the Final examination; the remainder of the period is at the discretion of the principal.

Where a clerk does not complete the course to the satisfaction of the college and/or is unsuccessful at the examination at the end of that course, he will be required to take the Institute's Intermediate examination under the normal rules of eligibility.

Enquiries from over fifty local education authorities have shown that the overwhelming majority are prepared to make major or minor county awards to students attending these courses. Application for an award for any of the four courses should be made by a student to the local authority in the area in which he resides.

The Redundancy Payments Act 1965 and Articled Service

The Council approved the following statement for publication and circulation to all members in practice in the United Kingdom:

1. For the purposes of this Act, an articled clerk is an employee. Where, normally, he is engaged under a contract of apprenticeship for a fixed term of two years or more, he comes within the ambit of the Act as an employee on a fixed-term contract whether or not the contract was made before the appointed day (December 6th, 1965). This does not mean that he will necessarily qualify for a redundancy payment when the contract ends:

he may have agreed to forgo his rights (see 2 and 3 below);
he may be offered further employment (see 4 below)
even if he is not offered further employment, this may not be because of redundancy (see 5 below).

2. An articled clerk may before his fixed term expires agree in writing to forgo any right to a redundancy payment upon the expiry of the term. Articles do not at present include such a condition. A principal should therefore consider whether to require any prospective articled clerk to sign such an agreement in consideration of his acceptance under articles. A specimen text is appended which can be suitably amended as shown to cover the case of a clerk already in articles. In the latter case, the disclaimer would have to be executed under seal. It is intended, when standard articles are next reprinted, to include a standard optional disclaimer clause.

3. A disclaimer cannot cover redundancy before the fixed term expires, such as might occur if a principal wound up or sold his practice during the period of the articles and the new owner of the practice did not offer to accept the articled clerk on corresponding conditions. Where such a situation seems likely to arise, the principal should have regard to the 'change of ownership' provisions of section 13 of the Act.

4. It does not automatically follow that a clerk who has declined to forgo his right will automatically become entitled to a redundancy payment on the expiry of the articles. The Institute has received legal advice that it is probable that no payment is due if the clerk receives from the employer a written offer of a new and different contract providing broadly for suitable employment in relation to the employee to take effect at latest four weeks after the expiry of the apprenticeship contract. The new offer must be made before the date on which the contract expires. Reference to sections 2 and 3 of the Act is advised. If the new offer is not accepted, entitlement to payment may depend on whether the employee has unreasonably refused the offer.

5. Even if no new contract is offered, entitlement to a payment will depend on whether the 'dismissal' is attributable wholly or mainly to redundancy. In the words of the Ministry of Labour Guide, paragraph 6, the question is whether 'the whole or main reason for his dismissal is that his employer's needs for employees to do work of a particular kind have diminished or ceased'. In case of dispute, the onus of proof is on the employer.

6. A further complication arises with a clerk articled to a member of a partnership. The apprenticeship contract is with the individual partner. Engagement at the end of the contract would normally be by the firm. The Act does not include any provision to cover such a situation. The following is a quotation from a letter received from the Ministry of Labour on this point:

'When a former articled clerk is re-engaged by his former principal together with the other partners it is in our opinion arguable that a re-engagement within the meaning of the Act has taken place and that the service under the new contract should be aggregated with service under the old contract. If a claim for rebate on redundancy payments were submitted to us along these lines we would not be inclined to dispute aggregation.'

7. Members will appreciate, however, that this is a departmental opinion only and that it would be a matter for legal interpretation whether in the circumstances described it could be argued that there was continuity of employment or whether an obligation to make a redundancy payment could arise at the conclusion of the clerk's articles.

8. On the question of rebates, members are reminded that unless advance notice of a redundancy dismissal is given to the Ministry, the rebate may, subject to appeal to the tribunal, be abated by up to 10 per cent.

Specimen Text of Disclaimer by a Prospective Articled Clerk Entering Articles for a Term of Two Years or More

To: The Principal

[In consideration of your agreeing to accept me as a clerk under articles upon the terms of the Deed of Articles executed immediately prior to this disclaimer] I hereby forgo in accordance with and to the extent permitted by section 15 of the Redundancy Payments Act any right to which I may be entitled to a payment under that Act.

DATED:                      SIGNED:

*For cases where the clerk is already in articles delete the words in square brackets and substitute:

'With reference to my service with you as an articled clerk under the terms of the Deed of Articles dated 19...'

Union of Chartered Accountant Students' Societies

Following consideration by the relevant committees of the Council of matters discussed on March 4th, 1966, between the Liaison Committee of U.C.A.S.S. and certain members of the Council, the Council authorized the publication of the following statement:

Responsibility of principals

The procedure for interviewing all new principals under bye-law 48 is believed to be serving a useful purpose in spreading knowledge and understanding of the Council's requirements. The whole question of standards of experience and supervision is under review.

Secondment to another practice

Bye-law 67 (b) (v) allows six months' secondment. A recent change in bye-law 67 makes easier the movement of articled clerks between associated firms. Compulsory secondment, as suggested by the Liaison Committee, would impose practical problems of administration too complicated to be acceptable.

Tuition

The Education Committee notes the desire of the Liaison Committee for further movement towards full-time tuition. In this connection attention is drawn to the introduction, on an experimental basis, of the four one-year full-time courses at selected colleges of further education. If these courses are successful it is expected that they will be expanded considerably in future years.

The Education Committee is aware of the need which was mentioned by the students to keep the profession fully informed of developments in education and training. Education sub-committees function in every district society area. A newsletter on educational topics is issued quarterly. Articles appear in the Institute newsletter and in the professional Press. On occasions of special importance (e.g. the introduction of the one-year pilot courses) circulars are sent out to all practising members.

Residential Courses

The Education Committee recognizes the particular value of residential courses. Accommodation at colleges is, however, subject to heavy pressure and the committee prefers to give priority to the establishment and expansion of block release courses (including the one-year courses) which will tend to be primarily non-residential. It is expected that the provision of residential courses will follow more naturally in a developed system of education in colleges.

Study Leave

There should be no room for doubt as to a clerk's entitlement to study leave. Articles which began after November 26th, 1963, provide as a minimum for four consecutive weeks' leave before the first attempt at each Institute examination, and for nine weeks' leave at other times. They also provide for reasonable leave to attend students' society lectures and meetings. Guidance on the interpretation of 'reasonable leave' is given in H2 of the Members' Handbook. All these periods of prescribed leave are in addition to time off to take the examinations and normal annual and public holidays. As the study leave clause is a prescribed clause in articles, any dispute arising from its interpretation may be referred to the Secretary of the Institute for a binding decision (bye-law 55).

Industrial Secondment

A register of companies willing to participate by offering to accept an articled clerk is maintained at the Institute. Because of conditions imposed by companies as to the number of places which they are willing to offer and, sometimes, as to the time of year when students will be accepted, it is not proposed to publish a list. Principals, or clerks having their principal's consent, who require advice should write to the Secretary of the Institute.

Examination Syllabus

The Examination Committee has noted the suggestion that the syllabus for the Final examination should include more on E.D.P. and Management Information. The committee takes the view that further experience of Advanced Accounting III (which was first set as recently as November 1965) should be obtained before any extension of the syllabus in these subjects can be considered.

Recruitment

The view expressed by the Liaison Committee on the importance of 'A' level recruitment accords entirely with Council policy. There has been an appreciable increase in 'A' level entrants.

Salaries

District societies have been invited to supplement the data provided by the Practitioner Enquiry on articled clerks' salaries by conducting local enquiries for the guidance of their members.

Examination Results

The Examination Committee notes the request of students for the earlier publication of examination results. The committee is conscious of the need for quick publication but the existing procedure has already been streamlined to the maximum extent consistent with ensuring fair treatment to candidates. There is, therefore, little present prospect of further reducing the time taken.

Lunch Break

The Examination Committee is at present examining the practicability of a shorter lunch break for the Final examination. The Committee wishes, however, to have further experience of the operation of the new two-part Final examination before reaching any definite decision.

Registration of Articles

The Secretary reported the registration of 107 articles of clerkship during June, the total number since January 1st, 1966, being 1,093.

OBITUARY

E. Miles Taylor, F.C.A.

Mr E. Miles Taylor, F.C.A., who died peacefully in his sleep two weeks ago at his home in Newbury, Berkshire, was well known to generations of students as the founder of the correspondence college 'The British College of Accountancy', and as a writer and lecturer on professional subjects. A member of both The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales and of the former Society of Incorporated Accountants, he had a rare touch at the peak of his powers as a practical tutor for the professional accountancy examinations and his writings, published mainly through the medium of his own publishing house, Textbooks Ltd, became equally well known. In these he collaborated successfully with others, like Victor Bayley and O. Griffiths, and books such as A Summary of Auditing Case Law became – and remain – minor classics.

He gave up his work as a practising accountant after several expressions of independence on professional etiquette – he was a rebel at heart – and devoted himself to the tuition field exclusively until failing health in post-war years forced him to dispose of the 'B.C.A.'.

Miles Taylor was a man who believed passionately in his own teaching methods; never the easiest of masters, he could nevertheless be the best of friends and he had a sure understanding of the difficulties of his students.

DOUBLE TAXATION: NORWAY

The Protocol to the United Kingdom – Norway Double Taxation Convention, which was signed on June 29th, was published on August 5th as a Schedule to a draft Order in Council.

NATIONAL INSURANCE REPORT

Reasons why all employees should keep statements showing their total earnings and tax deducted in the 1965–66 tax year are given in the recently published annual report<sup>1</sup> of the Ministry of Pensions and National Insurance (now renamed the Ministry of Social Security).

There is a special chapter dealing with earnings-related supplements to unemployment, sickness, and other benefits under the National Insurance Act 1966. This emphasizes that these statements, i.e. the Certificate of Pay and Tax Deducted showing the annual figure of gross earnings and income tax paid (the standard Inland Revenue Form P60 or its equivalent) which is issued by employers to each employee at the end of the tax year, will be used to the fullest possible extent to determine reckonable earnings quickly and to keep special inquiries to a minimum on claims for benefit.

ments and the other main changes under the 1966 Act will come into operation in the first week in October and the additional contributions will be payable from October 5th.

The report states that the transfer of work to the Ministry's new Computer Centre which is being established at Reading will start towards the end of next year. When fully loaded the system will be maintaining about two and a half million insured persons' records and issuing some fifty thousand payments a day. During 1965 the Ministry also continued its detailed examination of proposals to use electronic data processing for the payment of pensions to over six and a half million retirement pensioners and widows.

Among other matters, the report shows that the average number of National Insurance benefits and allowances, together with family allowances and war pensions, being paid each week is about thirteen million, including over six million retirement pensions. At the end of 1965, the cost of all payments being made by the Ministry was at the rate of over £2,000 million a year, not including National Assistance.

The average number of persons for whom National Insurance contributions were payable during 1964 was over twenty-five million, of whom over sixteen and a half million were men. Over twenty-three million were employed persons, nearly one and a half million self-employed and nearly a quarter of a million non-employed.

PRICES AND WAGES FREEZE

Every accountant will need a reliable book explaining the Prices and Incomes Act 1966. Only in this way can he be absolutely sure that he understands the effect of the Act, and so can be in a position to consider with his client whether any special provisions need to be made in accounts.

Butterworths will be publishing a new book giving a complete run-down on the 'Freeze' before the end of August. Winsley Sergeant, M.A., F.C.A., provides an explanatory account in non-legal language of the background and effect of the Act. The complete text of the Act is then set out, accompanied by helpful notes by E. Roydhouse, LL.B., Barrister-at-law. Appendices contain the text of the relevant White Papers.

Selective Employment Tax

WITH the passing of the Finance Act 1966 and the Selective Employment Payments Act 1966, the selective employment tax under the former Act and the refunds and premiums under the latter have now come into operation, although no tax will be payable until September 5th next, and no refunds or premiums will be payable until January 1967 at the earliest.

The reason for the two sets of statutory provisions is that the tax is to be collected by the Minister of Pensions and National Insurance, while refunds will be made by the Minister of Labour, the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, and the Minister of Social Security. Premiums in qualifying cases will be paid by the Minister of Labour. This is in fact the first time in the history of tax legislation in Britain that a major tax has not been administered by the Inland Revenue or by the Commissioners of Customs and Excise.

Section 44 of the Finance Act provides that in respect of each contribution week beginning on or after September 5th, 1966, an employer who pays National Insurance contributions for an employee must pay in respect of that employee tax of 25s a week for a man over 18 years of age, 12s 6d a week for a woman over 18 or boy under 18, and 8s for a girl under 18. The tax will be payable in respect of part-time employees working more than eight hours a week as well as whole-time employees, and at the same rates – which aroused much criticism in Parliament. The old-age pensioner who helps in the garden two days a week, the part-time cleaner, the Friday afternoon and Saturday shop assistant, and the relays of part-time workers at hotels and restaurants will all become increasingly expensive, and many will probably lose their employment – to the undoubted detriment of the efficiency of the tourist industry as a major earner of foreign exchange.

The Government's answer to suggestions that the limit for exemption from the tax should be raised to twenty hours a week is that many workers would lose their insurance cover; but this merely shows the unwisdom of using for the collection of a major tax the National Insurance system which was never designed for that purpose.

Exempted from the tax are self-employed persons, persons employed for not more than eight hours a week, and cases where the employer's insurance contribution is reduced by virtue of regulations made under sections 99 and 100 of the National Insurance Act 1965, which relate to the armed forces, mariners and airmen.

Section 1 of the Selective Employment Payments Act provides that where an employer has paid the tax in respect of an employment to which the section applies, the Minister of Labour is to make to the employer payment of an amount equal to the tax paid, together with a premium of 7s 6d a week for a man over 18, 3s 9d for a woman over 18 or a boy under 18, and 2s 6d for a girl under 18.

The section applies where (a) the employer's establishment is engaged in manufacturing activities within Order III to XVI in the Standard Industrial Classification, or in the manufacture of cinematograph films for public exhibition, or in scientific research or training relating to such activities; (b) more than half the persons in the establishment are employed wholly or mainly in connection with such activities, research or training; and (c) not more than half the employees in the establishment are engaged wholly or mainly in non-qualifying activities as defined in section 10 (1). Broadly, these are office work, road transport of the employer's own goods or of the goods of an associated company, and activities by way of sale of the employer's goods. Premiums may also be paid in respect of establishments certified by the Minister of Technology to be engaged in research relevant to manufacture.

This section will undoubtedly lead to many anomalies. If an 'establishment' employs 51 per cent of its workers in manufacturing activities within (a) above, the establishment will qualify for premiums although 49 per cent of workers are employed in office work. But if the office block is on the opposite side of the road from the works, the establishment will not fall within section 10 (2) of the Act, which provides that all premises or parts of premises occupied for the purposes of his business by one employer shall be treated as constituting the site of an establishment if, but only if, access between all parts of the area comprised in those premises or parts of premises is available without leaving premises so occupied.

By subsection (3) however, which has been amended, the appropriate Minister may, if he thinks fit, on the application of the employer, treat different parts of premises as constituting the sites of different establishments, or treat different premises as constituting the site of a single establishment. But it seems almost too much to hope that a Minister will exercise this right merely to enable the employer to qualify for premiums, and it appears that already one establishment is busy with plans for a bridge over the road!

An industry likely to be hard hit by the new tax is the contract cleaning industry which sends out a small army of Mrs Mopps to clean factory premises. It will have to pay the tax but will not normally qualify for any refund. It was suggested by members of Parliament during the Committee stage of the Bill that this was unfair since, if the cleaners were directly employed by the establishment, they would normally qualify for premiums as well as refunds of tax.

Under section 2 of the Act, refunds of tax (but not premiums) will be made in respect of establishments engaged in (a) fishing, mining and quarrying, electricity and water supply, transport and communication; (b) the extraction of coal from opencast workings; (c) the operation of road transport for an establishment of the same employer or of associated companies, and (d) certain other activities, research or training which does not qualify for premiums. Refunds will also be made to employers in respect of establishments engaged in agriculture, horticulture or forestry. The conditions relating to the proportions and activities of persons engaged under section 2 are the same as under section 1.

Section 3 authorizes refunds of tax to nationalized undertakings and the payment of premiums also in respect of certain parts of those undertakings, such as railway and engineering workshops. Section 4 provides for payments to local authorities related to the amount of tax paid, and section 5 for refunds to charities in respect of employees who do not otherwise attract premium or refund.

Section 6 requires the Ministry of Social Security (formerly the National Assistance Board) to make refunds in respect of domestic or nursing help in a 'qualified' private household, but the conditions are narrow and stringent. To be qualified the household must include (a) a person over 70 years old; or (b) a person who is infirm, sick, incapacitated or pregnant; or (c) a child under the age of 16 where one parent only or the guardian of the child resides in the house, but goes out to work. And no refund will be made unless the Supplementary Benefits Commission, or an appeal tribunal, have satisfied themselves regarding the employer's claim. Sections 7 to 9 contain administrative provisions.

The new tax arrangements have been severely criticized in and out of Parliament. To raise £240

Corporation Tax Machinery

In the article on 'Corporation Tax Machinery' in last week's issue, it was stated that the burden of paying the tax lies on the company's secretary (with a right of reimbursement). This, however, does not apply where the company is incorporated under the various British Companies Acts or by Charter. This misreading of paragraph 24 (2) of Schedule 6 to the Finance Act 1966 was not, unfortunately, noticed until after the issue had gone to press.

million in a normal year – but less income tax and profits tax or corporation tax, as the case may be, because the employment tax ranks as a charge against profits so that the Government will pay a good part of the tax itself – no less than £1,100 million is being collected, of which £859 million will be returned by way of refunds and premiums to employers who are not ultimately liable for it. The net gain to the Government (less tax relief) will thus be something of the order of £150 million. Small wonder that some time ago The Economist called this ‘custard pie economics’.

On the second reading of the Selective Employment Payments Bill the Minister of Labour (Mr R. J. GUNTER) said the employment tax was intended to have both short- and long-term effects. In the short term its main purpose was to raise additional revenue in order to restrain consumer demand and thereby improve the balance of payments position, and to do this in a way which would help to redress the tax balance between the manufacturing and service sectors of the economy. In the longer term it had the additional aim of making more manpower available for manufacturing industry by encouraging economy in the use of labour in the services. Since then much water has flowed under the bridge. The ‘regulator’ has been applied and more besides. Manufacturing industry is on the downturn, unemployment is on the way, prices and wages are to be pegged. The tax has already lost some of its purposes. Whether the Chancellor has reason to be proud of his new ‘brain-child’ only time will tell.

Current Affairs

The Squeeze Tightened

LAST week's intensification of the credit squeeze was intended, in the words of the statement issued by the Bank of England, to help ‘to meet the requirements of those borrowers who have, in accordance with national policy, to be given priority while at the same time observing present restrictions to the full’. The statement continued: ‘Since most banks are at or near the prescribed limits, the Bank has stressed the need for an immediate review of existing advances and advance facilities, even where these would not necessarily have been regarded as due for reconsideration.’

The banks have, of course, for some time been giving priority to the financing of exports and have been restricting credit required to finance imports of manufactured products. The overall demand for credit was clearly expected to rise from the beginning of September when payment of selective employment tax starts. The banks had already been told that they would be given no scope to help with the payment of selective employment tax which is expected to absorb nearly £300 million by the end of the year when manufacturing industry starts to receive repayment of the tax and the premiums to which it is entitled. The latest letter from the Bank of England appears to have been intended to provide the branch managers of the clearing banks with the necessary authority to reduce overdraft limits already agreed or call in existing advances if this should be necessary in order to maintain the present overall ceiling for lending. The main burden may be expected to fall on the private borrower, the retail trade, property development and the service industries in general.

Model for the I.R.C.

DESPITE the current crisis no changes seem to be contemplated for the new Industrial Reorganization Corporation, although as a correspondent to this journal recently pointed out in the July 23rd issue, just what the policy and modus operandi will be is anyone's guess. And as another letter in this current issue shows, the earlier correspondent is not alone in his doubts and uncertainties.

Some answers to these highly important issues are offered in a topical and extremely lucid Research Monograph published last week by the Institute of Economic Affairs<sup>1</sup> on the basis of an evaluation of the achievements since 1933 of the Italian I.R.I. (Istituto per la Ricostruzione Industriale). Its author, a young Italian economist, Mr Mario Deaglio, has the merit of being objective and lucid. He makes the important point that the I.R.I. was an ‘Italian solution to an Italian problem’ and it would be unwise to assume that its experience will be shared by the British I.R.C.

Currently the I.R.I. owns or controls about one hundred and fifty companies which together account for between 10 and 15 per cent of Italy's industrial output. Apart from the State's contribution of some £250 million to its resources, the I.R.I. has raised ten times this sum in the open market to further its operations. The rate of return is not high. Dividends obtained by the I.R.I. are about 4.6 per cent of balance sheet values of companies owned by the I.R.I. and this, for the Italian market is low, although not all the capital bears interest and, as the author points out, for those member companies which pay dividends, the yields are about normal.

While it is impossible to evaluate the precise benefits of the I.R.I. experiments, not least since there have been many failures as well as successes, Mr Deaglio believes that its experience offers a number of guidelines for the I.R.C. There must, he stresses, be complete separation between economic control of the undertakings and the Civil Service; borrowing must be carried out in the open market and the member companies should be subject to the same legal and commercial rules as other companies in the private sector.

It remains to be seen how far these objectives will be achieved by the I.R.C. Anyone assessing the prospects on the basis of the experience of the nationalized industries will be less than sanguine about the contribution the I.R.C. is likely to make to Britain's economic resurgence.

'And is there Honey still for Tea?'

SALARY surveys inevitably invite comparisons and comparisons almost inevitably result in the man getting less wanting more and the man getting more wanting still more in order to establish what he thinks should be the true differential. And so on. At a time when Britain desperately requires a permanent policy which will rationalize remuneration at all levels – the salaries and wages freeze is only an uneasy expedient which will result in an avalanche of claims and increases when the thaw comes, with disastrous economic consequences – productivity in salary surveys seems to be at its peak. Last week in these columns we commented on two, both confined to conditions for executives in the United Kingdom. This week another has come to hand comparing certain executive salaries in Europe and North America.<sup>1</sup>

It would seem that, in a number of cases, the British export salesman would not only be financially better off living abroad but would also be relieved of much of the fatigue of constant travelling. Taking into account both the incidence of taxation and the cost of living, a married man with two children under 11 and a gross income earned in the United Kingdom of £2,500 has a spendable income of £1,977. The corresponding figures for France, Canada, West Germany, Ireland and Belgium are £2,320, £2,174, £2,143, £2,068 and £2,046. The lowest reported country is Denmark with £1,751. If he were earning £10,000 a year, his net income would be £5,973 as against £7,820 in France and £5,562 in Denmark.

These revelations are not likely to cause a mass migration of super-salesmen from these shores. The survey, like so many of its kind, is soulless and takes no account of loyalties, national and local, of factors such as housing and education, and of the little personal preferences and prejudices which for most people are the essence of life. The wine, for example, may be better in France but the beer definitely is not. French rugby may be more spectacular than in Britain but there is much less of it and cricket across the Channel is virtually non-existent. The grass always seems to grow greener in one's native land and the expatriate executive, sipping his alien aperitif instead of downing bitter at his 'local', might constantly be prey to the same homesick thoughts which assailed Rupert Brooke in the Café des Westens, Berlin. It would take a mighty lot of tax relief to make up for that.

Anti Bond-washing Moves

STOCK EXCHANGE rules are being tightened to a degree which it is considered will effectively plug all loopholes through which bond-washing operations pass. Basically the complicated changes, in already complicated rules, mean a far stricter control of dealings 'ex dividend' in Government and other stocks in the three weeks' period before the official ex dividend quotation date.

It was the ability to deal on an ex dividend basis in this three-week period which led to the bond-washing operations which recently resulted in the suspension of a number of Stock Exchange members. The main intended changes in the rules call for the certification of all transfers of more than £10,000 before delivery and the depositing of delivered stock with the Quotations Department for release when stock goes officially ex dividend.

Settlement of dividends is being tightened by the demand of original tax vouchers. All tax vouchers supporting jobbers' dividend accounts must be held for a period of six years. Jobber-to-jobber switching operations are forbidden within twenty-eight days of making up a jobber's account.

There are a number of other minor alterations in the rules and in view of the complications involved, the Council decided that four weeks would be allowed before the changes were confirmed. Confirmation of the changes will come on September 5th and the opinion is that the new moves will make bond-washing operations virtually impossible.

Lloyd's Results

THE results announced by Lloyd's this week show that few of its six thousand or so members (the majority of whom are 'outside' names and do not work at Lloyd's) are making any worthwhile profit from their underwriting.

The 1963 account was closed at the end of last year and over a total net premium income of £369,114,403, there was a profit of no more than 1.48 per cent – the lowest percentage since these figures were first kept in 1948.

Apart from the virtually insignificant life account, all classes of business deteriorated in profitability during 1963, compared with 1962.

General non-marine insurance, which accounts for more than half the business at Lloyd's, brought a loss of 2.70 per cent (compared with a 0.65 per cent loss in 1962). This was due to increased crime, disastrous world-wide fire losses, windstorms in the Caribbean, and a host of other causes, including high fraud and fidelity losses (especially from banking houses throughout the world).

The marine market showed a small profit in 1963, but this is expected to turn into a loss in the 1964 and 1965 accounts. Similarly in the aviation account, although the claims ratio for the 1963 account was no higher than 75.71 per cent, increasing competition, with a resulting drop in rates, is expected to reduce the profit to negligible proportions and this account, too, could well result in a loss.

Motor insurance in the United Kingdom – unprofitable to so many insurance companies – usually produces a profit at Lloyd's due to the selectivity of the underwriters who are not influenced by any other business which a policyholder may have. Nevertheless, due to increased costs of repairs and particularly to higher Court awards for personal injury, profitability has deteriorated.

Already some members are being asked by their underwriting agents for funds to maintain their reserves. More losses can be expected in the next few years from a number of syndicates.

This is My Life

by An Industrious Accountant

THE chairman telephoned to ask me to pop along to his room. 'Just a chat about one or two points', he explained vaguely, so I went prepared for anything.

He talked for a while about his impending retirement, an event which always seemed to recede farther into the distance as each month passed, though he appeared to feel an anticipatory wistfulness whenever he mentioned it. I murmured some appropriate expressions of regret, and at length he disposed with the formalities and got down to business. 'About a motor-car', he said. 'How do I stand tax-wise about buying a second-hand vehicle from the company?'

The trouble with our chairman is twofold. First, he tends to shoot out tricky questions without any advance notice. Secondly, he has usually probed the problem in advance in discussion with other knowledgeable (and perhaps not so knowledgeable) acquaintances; and he is therefore likely to be either already well briefed or pig-headedly sceptical of any advice one may venture to offer.

The chances were in this case that he had heard some smart story at his club, had ventilated it en passant with his solicitor or the tax partner of our firm of accountants, and was now intent on picking my brains. It was a moment when caution was indicated.

Our practice, I explained to him carefully, was to estimate the probable trade-in value of our cars – usually about £250 – and then to write-off the balance in two equal instalments over two years from date of purchase. This averaged a shirt-traveller's car, for example – probably hard driven for 30,000 miles per annum – with an office vehicle which pottered round town on casual errands at perhaps 5,000 miles a year. However, the sale price to our chairman would clearly depend on special circumstances (a delicate cough indicated that this wasn't my function) and of course any element of fringe benefit would need to be watched. He nodded vaguely, without comment, so I knew he'd covered this particular ground already, and then he switched quickly to another topic.

'What about the assessability to tax of a lump sum on retirement?' he asked, coming at last to his real interest. Here, as luck would have it, I was ready for him. I had only just been reading the interesting report of the recent case of Clayton v. Lavender.

There, it will be recalled, the taxpayer had an agreement with a company to the effect that his engagement should continue for five years and thereafter be terminable by six months' notice on either side. After a year had elapsed, however, he notified his managing director of his wish to terminate his employment at the end of the contracted period. The managing director suggested the agreement be terminated forthwith, and he was paid different sums for the next two years. These payments were termed 'salary' and income tax was deducted under P.A.Y.E. Subsequently he claimed successfully that the sums were paid to him in consideration of the surrender of his rights under the agreement and were not assessable under Schedule E.

Subject to further examination of the details, and to consultation with the experts, I ventured, would the chairman like to consider the feasibility of an appropriately phrased agreement, with the possibility of termination on a similar basis?

The chairman certainly would. His eyes gleamed and his cheeks went pink as he reached for the phone to contact his solicitor. I had second thoughts about both the ethics of the arrangement and its application in his case when I saw his eagerness to pursue it, but he would listen no further. I hope he doesn't rush into trouble too precipitately, but tax avoidance has an uncanny attraction for many top people.

Pension Schemes for Not-so-small Companies

by A CONSULTING ACTUARY

AN article in The Accountant of July 16th last, by an insurance correspondent, referred to 'Pension Schemes for Small Companies'. Many medium and large companies also have pension problems at the present time, but somewhat different from those facing the small company. These are the companies whose pension schemes have contributions of over £10,000 per annum who, as the author of the previous article implied, should consider a privately invested scheme.

In the first place, as the previous writer stated, most really large employers already have pension schemes of one kind or another, although in many cases these apply only to staff and not to works employees. An increasing number of middle-size companies also have pension schemes of several years' standing. Those responsible for such schemes are faced with the need for periodic review of the arrangements to keep them in line with current needs. What are likely to be the main short-comings of existing pension schemes at the present time?

Effects of inflation

There would appear to be three. First, benefits may have become inadequate because of the effects of inflation. Secondly, the scheme may need to be adjusted to take account of changed National Insurance benefits and contributions. Thirdly, eligibility may need to be extended to include works employees.

As regards the first point, the effects of inflation, there are two main remedies, as the previous writer stated. The principal aim should be to ensure that the pension at the time of retirement provides a reasonable standard of living in comparison with the standard of living provided by the salary or wages earned just prior to retirement. From the members' standpoint this is best achieved by a final salary scheme which gears pension directly to the rate of earnings at retirement. Many pension schemes are still on a 'career average' plan, whereby pension entitlement is built up brick by brick, each brick corresponding to a year of service, and the size of the brick being related to earnings in that year. A change to a final salary basis is often advocated.

However, before embarking on such a change, management should satisfy itself that full account has been taken of the consequences, for although it is usual for the costings of such funds to make allowance for salaries and wages to increase at an assumed rate of growth, for example, 3 per cent per annum, quite a heavy liability can fall on a fund if the forecast rate is exceeded. Take a fund which provides a pension of one-sixtieth final salary for each year of service. If, after the fund has been in force for ten years, wages and salaries increments should amount to  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent instead of 3 per cent, the prospective pensions in respect of service to date alone would increase by  $\frac{3}{4}$  per cent of the salary roll. Taking the value of a pension to a man of 65 as an arbitrary ten years purchase, this means that a capital sum of about  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent of the salary/wages roll will eventually have to be accumulated. The example taken is an extreme one, but the same consequence can result from the accumulative effect of smaller deviations from the rate of salary roll-up, spread over a period of years, and eventually the cost has to be met either out of profits or from higher prices paid by the company's customers.

In the light of the Prime Minister's recent statement, neither adjustment looks particularly easy, particularly if labour costs represent a large proportion of end-product costs.

Adjustment for National Insurance benefits

The next point – the adjustment of scheme benefits to allow for National Insurance benefits – is a much argued topic. However, when all the partisan viewpoints have been expressed, no one can believe that either State provision or occupational pension schemes alone can provide the complete answer. In the House of Commons on February 23rd, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Mr Douglas Houghton, outlined the Government's intentions for the National

Insurance Scheme. Three of his points are particularly relevant:<sup>1</sup>

'A later phase in the development of our plans will be a scheme for earnings-based pensions. We need time for this, and we need greater strength in the economy as well. . . .'

'I also want to stress that there is no room within the limits of expenditure which we have set ourselves in the interests of sound financial policy for any significant expenditure before 1970 on the new national superannuation scheme on which we are working at the present time. We cannot move faster than our economic growth will allow. We said so in 1964, we have said it many times since and I repeat it again today. . . .'

'No State scheme can satisfy every requirement. There is a partnership here that we would wish to foster and encourage. Occupational schemes and the State scheme can live together to give mutual support, but I repeat that occupational schemes cannot be an effective substitute for a national scheme.'

Recent changes in the economic circumstances of the country have underlined the force of these remarks. There is really no justification for the unthinking comment one sometimes hears 'if the Government scheme is going to provide pensions of half earnings there will be no need for private pension schemes'. Any company revising its pension arrangements should plan for the State scheme to play an increasing part in pension provision and recognize that the benefits of occupational schemes need to be related to the State pension so that the two forms of benefit together produce adequate benefits at retirement.

Schemes need to be reviewed

If the occupational pension is arranged without regard to the State provision, companies may find that they are providing too much pension for their lower paid employees and relatively less for their more highly paid staff. There is always a great temptation to defer revising pension schemes until the Government's latest plans are published and this can lead to the undue postponement of pressing changes. There are many firms today which have been putting off overdue changes for several years past. First, they were reluctant to move during the uncertainty of the last year of the Conservative Government. After the results of the 1964 General Election they postponed making any changes because they considered that the Government's days were limited and nearly eighteen months slipped by until the Labour Government was again returned to office in March this year. Many of the same firms are still delaying overdue reviews pending the publication of the Government's proposed White Paper. Occupational schemes need to be reviewed if they are to fulfil their original purpose and it is a mistake to keep postponing necessary changes.

However, it is almost certainly a mistake for a company which chose to contract out of graduated pension arrangements to change its view at the present time, or vice versa. Assuming that the original decisions were sensibly taken, having regard to the circumstances of the company, there can be no real justification for making any change per se at the present time. Employers should look critically at such claims as 'you could save £x thousand each year by contracting out of the State graduated scheme'.

Inclusion of works employees

The third reason for which a pension scheme may need revision is that it may make only inadequate provision for works employees. Until recent years there has been a sharp division in the conditions of service between works employees and office staff. This has affected such conditions of service as holidays with pay, entitlement to notice, sick pay, etc. In recent years the more progressive firms, and particularly those which have transatlantic affiliations, have been questioning this dichotomy and the expression 'blue collar workers' has come into use to denote those skilled workers on whose skill advanced technologies depend. This change of approach also entails a review of pension provision, and the current tendency is increasingly towards like provision for works staff and office staff.

The present uncertainty regarding National Insurance changes may slow down this changeover but the trend is clear and it appears entirely desirable in the interest of improved industrial relations that the change should come about.

These are the sort of alterations in the benefits and contributions which may be necessary. If a scheme is being revised to incorporate some of these changes, there may also be an opportunity to alter the methods of financing the scheme, possibly involving a change of the insurance company assuring the benefits or a change to a privately-invested fund.

In recent years some of the insurance companies prominent in the pension field have become victims of their own success and their standards of administration have suffered. However, before changing to another insurance company or to a privately-invested fund, an employer would be well advised to find out the extent of the financial penalties imposed by his existing insurer should he discontinue his pension policy. These can be very severe and take the form of a stringent basis for calculating the amounts of fully paid pensions. They are intended to discourage the employer from making a change, as well as to give financial protection to the insurer.

It is only fair to add that some insurance companies charge only nominal penalties on discontinuance and that some companies have maintained a reasonably good standard of service, notwithstanding their staff difficulties.

However, if some insurance companies are able to give good service and find it unnecessary to impose severe financial penalties to tie pension schemes to them, why not all?

Revision of financial provisions

Companies with pension schemes may find themselves in much the same position regarding the overhaul of their pension arrangements as they do over their computer system. The analogy is not all that far-fetched. Pension schemes and computer systems both require periodic review to make sure that they are still carrying out their functions satisfactorily. In both cases the decision as to when to make a changeover may be quite critical. Further, computer manufacturers find that companies shopping for their second and subsequent computers have much more definite ideas of what they require and are much more discriminating purchasers than companies in the computer market for the first time.

Companies revising a pension scheme with several years' experience behind them are also likely to ask much more searching questions than a company setting up its first ever pension arrangement. There the analogy with computers breaks down, because although a company selecting a new computer system may consider changing to another manufacturer, there can be very few companies which have the technical resources to contemplate building their own computer. In the pension field this is not so; many companies with several years of experience of insured pension schemes are fully capable of running a thoroughly satisfactory privately-invested fund.

Statistics of occupational pension funds show, as might be expected, that the larger the fund, the more likely it is to be self-administered and it is a natural evolution for a scheme which starts modestly as an insured plan to become self-administered as it expands the range and size of its benefits. What is the minimum size for becoming self-administered?

Small privately-invested funds

In the previous article it was suggested that only where contributions, employers' and employees', exceed £10,000 per annum should a privately-invested scheme be contemplated. The writer of the present article, however, whilst agreeing with the indicated order of magnitude, would contend that the general character of the employer should be the major factor in determining whether he should set up his own pension fund.

A small company with a thoroughly competent company secretary and whose board includes two or three directors with sound financial backgrounds can embark on its own pension fund with every prospect of success, even though the number of members initially may be quite small. The advantage of a large membership is that it is then easier to predict the experience of the fund; for example, some pensioners may live a long time, but the strain which payment of their pension may put on the fund will probably be offset by other unexpectedly early deaths. The larger the number of pensioners, the less likely it is that the fund will suffer any undue strain from such causes. A small fund cannot rely on this automatic cancelling out and positive action may be needed to anticipate and eliminate the possibility of such a strain occurring.

However, this is a feature which the actuaries to the fund will have well in mind. Two examples will illustrate the sort of danger and the way in which the risk can be covered. One or two of the pensioners, early in the existence of the fund, may be former senior executives drawing large pensions. If they should live to advanced old age the resultant strain on the fund could be considerable. To deal with this possibility the actuary may advise the trustees of the fund to effect a deferred annuity with a life office on the life of such a pensioner. The effect is that the first ten or twelve years only of his pension falls on the fund; should he live beyond this period the fund will be recompensed, in whole or in part, by the annuity payments it receives from the life office assuring the deferred annuity. It may be financially disadvantageous to buy such a deferred annuity but it is prudent to incur a small ascertainable penalty rather than to run a large unascertainable risk.

Pension to widow of a member

In a similar way the actuary will keep under review the extent of the liabilities on the fund consequent on death in service. In some funds the capital value of a pension to the widow of a member may greatly exceed the reserve built up in the fund in respect of that member. It is a matter of professional judgement to decide to what extent these risks can be borne within the fund, but if necessary the fund can be protected from excessive risks by insuring the lives of those members for whom the potential risk is high. This can be done by effecting a group life assurance policy in the name of the trustees. The assurance can be progressively reduced as the fund grows stronger.

By means such as these, quite a small company can set up a sound pension fund, even although the number of members may be small, provided the company has competent staff to administer it and has directors of the right sort to oversee it. By contrast, a large company setting aside much more than £10,000 per annum for pensions may be well advised to leave its pension scheme in the hands of a good insurance company. One could visualize a light engineering company, with two or three consumer products of its own but mainly engaged in subcontracting. Each of the four directors is engaged full-time in the business and the continued high profitability of the company is a tribute to their expertise in their own field. None of the directors would claim deep financial knowledge, the company secretary is not equipped by experience to fill this gap and is already at full stretch. Although the company may have an annual wages bill in excess of £½ million, it is probably wise not to attempt to run its own fund.

What are the prospective advantages of a privately-invested fund? Briefly they are as follows.

Yield

It should be possible for a competently managed privately-invested fund to obtain a yield on its investments which is higher than that obtained from an insured pension scheme, even if the insured contract is one which participates in the profits of the life office. Further, the employer can be sure that any capital gains accrue to the benefit of the fund, and are not applied in strengthening the hidden reserves of the insurance company. Non-profit insured pension schemes effectively yield, say, 4½ to 4¾ per cent per annum on the money invested. With-profit schemes, about 1 to 1½ per cent more if current bonuses are maintained. Yields (including capital profits) of 7 to 10 per cent are not uncommon among privately invested funds. All these rates are free of tax.

In this connection the following table is of some interest:

Rate of interest x per cent					Annual contributions required to produce a fund of £1 million at end of thirty years £
4	..	..	..	..	17,144
5	..	..	..	..	14,335
6	..	..	..	..	11,933
7	..	..	..	..	9,894
8	..	..	..	..	8,174
9	..	..	..	..	6,731
10	..	..	..	..	5,527

Flexibility

A privately-invested fund is much more adaptable to the needs of the employer than is an insured scheme. In recent years, under the force of competition from privately-invested schemes, insured pension schemes have become far less rigid than once was the case, but the traditional insured pension scheme is still ultimately governed by premium rates which determine the amount of pension purchased by each payment made to the life office. Not only does this entail a great deal of clerical effort but it is not possible to make provision in the premium basis for factors which are dependent partly on decisions by the employer. For example, it may be desired to pay pensions on early retirement due to breakdown in health. This is a risk which cannot be insured and it is unusual for insured pension funds to provide for the payment of full rate pensions on enforced retirement due to ill-health. If provided at all, the financing of the pension is unplanned. Under a privately-invested fund, payment of ill-health pensions is commonplace and the cost is estimated in advance so that the incidence of cost emerges evenly.

There is another way in which a privately-invested fund can have an advantage over an insured scheme. Under an insured scheme an insurance company will not start paying a pension until the whole capital value of the pension has been deposited. If several highly-paid executives will be among the first to draw their pensions, this requirement may involve the employer in very heavy payments in the early years of the fund. Under a privately-invested fund it is not essential that the full capital value of a pension should have been accumulated before payment of the pension commences. Clearly, advantage must not be taken of this less stringent costing to a point where the soundness of the fund is jeopardized but, judiciously applied, the financing of a fund can be considerably eased.

What are the disadvantages of a privately-invested scheme as opposed to a scheme with an insurance company? With an insurance company the mortality and other factors are pooled with those of other pension schemes and the individual fund is protected from the effects of stray deviations in its experience. Much play is made of this but, as has been shown above, this can be achieved in a privately-invested fund.

It is also fair to remark that the risks which can be insured are those which it is easiest to predict, at least in the short-term. The two factors which have most bearing on the actual cost of a pension scheme are the future progress of salaries and the yield realized. An insurance company cannot underwrite the first risk and it falls back on the employer in both insured and privately-invested fund.

As to yield, it is true that an insurance company effectively guarantees a minimum yield, subject to the right to change premium rates in the future, but this guarantee is usually at so low a level that it is of little value. Companies operating privately-invested funds prefer to forgo the guaranteed minimum in exchange for the certainty that the results of a successful investment policy will not be diverted away from the fund.

Cost of fees

A privately-invested fund also has to meet the cost of fees for professional services in setting up the fund and for valuing the fund periodically. Legal costs, actuarial fees and printing of members' booklets, etc., may amount to several hundred pounds for the setting up of a pension fund. This serves to make very small privately-invested funds uneconomic, at least in the financial sense. Under an insured scheme these charges are hidden by a loading in the premium rates.

A pension scheme which is being extended to provide more adequate pensions and possibly also to cover works employees for the first time, may justify setting up a privately-invested fund. It need cost very little time and money to explore the possibility and it may prove time and money well invested.

The Present Practice and Modern Developments in Auditing in the United States of America—I

by R. KIRK BATZER, A.B., M.S., C.P.A.

IN preparing a paper addressed to members of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, I am distinctly aware that many accounting terms and expressions used herein will seem strange to the reader. For example, stock will be called inventory; debtors will appear as accounts receivable. I ask your indulgence in reviewing this paper as it would be impossible for me to express myself in terms other than those I customarily use.

The growth of the profession

1. The services performed for clients by independent public accountants in the United States have been importantly influenced by the events of the last two decades. Services related to taxes, which resulted in substantial growth to the profession after the advent of our income tax law in 1913, continue to be an important element of our work. To an increasing degree, our clients look to us for advice in considering the tax consequence of important business transactions. The Government usually consults our professional organizations when changes in the basis of determining taxes are under consideration.

2. For many years accountants have given important help to clients in the design and installation of all types of record-keeping systems, particularly those concerned with financial accounting. With the great increase in the amount of record keeping and the proliferation of accounting machinery, this portion of professional services has grown far beyond anything that was expected when most of us started in the profession. This work is now usually referred to as management consulting services.

3. The dramatic changes in tax services and management consulting services tend to obscure the important developments in auditing, which continues to be our profession's principal activity, and in my judgement, a most useful service to our economy. There is no diminution in the need or the demand for auditing services. Quite the contrary, bankers and other important money-lenders continue to press borrowers for audited financial statements. Investors take it for granted that annual financial statements will be audited. A recent change in legislation concerning our Securities and Exchange Commission has established a requirement calling for audited financial statements from a large number of companies previously exempt from such requirement.

The development of the accountant's duties

4. The present duties and professional standards of the certified public accountant in the United States have been outlined by my partners in Montgomery's Auditing. They are the result of the development of the profession, which has taken place, for the most part, within comparatively recent times. At the beginning of this century the public accountant's function was largely that of an adjunct to the accounting department of business. Most clients were small, and accounting systems with internal control procedures were seldom found. Accounting as an aid to management was in its infancy, and the chief service required of the public accountant by owner-managers was to furnish them with a competent outsider's check on the accuracy of the records and to furnish reasonable assurance that the book-keeper had not misappropriated funds. In contrast to those of the present day, business transactions were usually not complex, and did not require highly developed judgement to determine whether accounting principles had been appropriately applied. Under those circumstances the public accountant's procedures usually included a detailed check of the client's records; because of the relatively small size of the concerns under examination, the cost of such audits was modest.

Mr R. Kirk Batzer, the author of this paper presented at the recent Oxford Summer Course of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, is a partner in the firm of L/brand, Ross Bros & Montgomery, of New York.

5. A number of factors have led to changes in the practice of public accounting, both as to techniques of auditing procedure and as to the services performed. The growth in size of business units and the multiplicity and complexity of business transactions have forced management to develop procedures for internal controls to assure accuracy in recording, and to prevent or disclose defalcations. As the number of individual transactions grew larger, the detail checking procedures once used by public accountants became impractical and the technical improvements in internal control made such detail check unnecessary. The use of accounting machinery and particularly the introduction of electronic computers have forced radical alterations in some conventional auditing procedures. The public accountant, as an expert in the field of accounting, has been able to advise management in the discharge of its responsibility for sound organization and efficient operation of the accounting department, and his place as a professional consultant has become well recognized.

6. From the beginning, the public accountant has usually concluded his examination with a report to his client which included his opinion regarding the related financial statements. Financing business expansion has required raising large amounts of capital; this situation has diffused ownership and has created large numbers of investors who are not intimately connected with management. This diffusion emphasizes the need for an independent appraisal of the fairness of reported results of management's stewardship as shown in annual financial statements made available to investors. Fairly stated financial statements result not only from dependable recording and summarization of financial transactions, but also from proper application of generally accepted principles of accounting. It is to be expected that the opinion of the public accountant, as a professional expert in such matters, should be sought.

7. For nearly thirty years the American Institute of Certified Public Accountants, recognizing the importance of the auditing activity and the changes therein, has had a standing committee concerned exclusively with such matters. The Committee on Auditing Procedure, as it is now called, is a senior committee of our Institute and is the body designated to express opinions on auditing matters. It does so principally by issuing pronouncements entitled 'Statements on Auditing Procedures'. As recently as 1963, the Committee reviewed and consolidated in one document substantially all of its preceding pronouncements.

Auditing standards

8. This document, entitled 'Auditing Standards and Procedures', reiterates the Committee's position that the objective of the ordinary examination of financial statements by the independent auditor is the expression of an opinion on the fairness with which they present financial position and results of operations. There is reference in the document to the responsibilities of the auditor, including those arising from statute, and a discussion about the detection of fraud. Considerable attention is paid to auditing standards, which deal with the quality of the audit performance and the objectives to be attained by the work undertaken. Three of these standards have, in my opinion, resulted in significant change in auditing during the recent past, and, in manner of speaking, are particularly germane to this paper; they are:

- (a) There is to be a proper study and evaluation of the existing internal control as a basis for reliance thereon and for the determination of the resultant extent of the tests to which auditing procedures are to be restricted.
- (b) Sufficient competent evidential matter is to be obtained through inspection, observation, inquiries and confirmations to afford a reasonable basis for an opinion regarding the financial statements under examination.
- (c) The examination is to be performed by a person or persons having adequate technical training and proficiency as an auditor.

Internal controls in accounting systems

9. The definition of accounting connotes an orderly and systematic method of recording and summarizing large numbers of business transactions. It supposes uniform treatment for like transactions. Therefore, the existence of a method or a system is inherent, as otherwise accounting would be useless and without meaning. As businesses become larger, the systems become more complex and in many cases it is useful and desirable to reduce them to written form. The written material may include a chart of accounts, describing those accounts authorized together with instructions for their use. Additional instructions can relate to the preparation of underlying accounting data and of reports and statements derived from the books of account. They can also relate to the processing of documents received from others which serve as a basis of the accounting, such as production and employment reports, receiving reports, and invoices from vendors.

10. Ideally, the verbal and written instructions provide for the suitable and orderly recording of transactions, and for their presentation in meaningful reports and statements. They should also provide that accounting data will be prepared and reviewed so as to prevent or at least minimize its misuse and also minimize the preparation of data that is intentionally wrong. Efforts toward these ends produce what accountants call the system of internal control. It seems elementary to repeat to this experienced group that the study and evaluation of this system is fundamental to an audit; without it an audit cannot be intelligently carried out.

11. At this point it may be useful to discuss what is meant by the term 'internal control'. The following definition is taken from a special report on that subject by the Auditing Procedure Committee of the American Institute of Certified Public Accountants:

'Internal control comprises the plan of organization and all of the co-ordinate methods and measures adopted within a business to safeguard its assets, check the accuracy and reliability of its accounting data, promote operational efficiency, and encourage adherence to prescribed managerial policies.'

12. The Committee stated that its definition 'possibly is broader than the meaning sometimes attributed to the term' and that 'a system of internal control extends beyond those matters which relate directly to the functions of the accounting and financial departments'. Certainly the term 'internal control' as defined by the Committee is very broad, and they expressed the belief that unless the kind of internal control under discussion is clarified, conclusions reached as to the independent auditor's responsibility in certain of the areas relating to it may be misunderstood. The general concept of internal control encompassed by the Committee's definition may be classified into three areas to which my partners have given distinctive titles, as indicated:

13. Internal administrative control.—Broadly speaking, the prime responsibility of management is to operate a business at a profit. It must produce an acceptable product at lowest practicable cost; it must develop markets in which its products can be sold at proper prices, and, because pressure of competition, changes in customer demand and other factors cause obsolescence of product lines, it must develop new or improved products to replace those obsolete. To accomplish these objectives, management must, among other things, develop proper policies leading to efficient production, distributions, and research; implement these policies through proper personnel selection, training, and compensation; communicate the means of effecting its policies through instructions, procedure manuals, and conferences; and police performance through operating supervision and controls. For example, the personnel department may have methods, standards, and procedures designed to ensure the hiring, training, and retention of employees; time and motion studies may promote efficient use of labour; quality control may sustain a policy of selling only first-grade merchandise to customers; comparison shoppers may police a policy of maintaining competitive selling prices. These factors may be described as 'internal administrative control'.

14. These controls are distinguishable from the other two areas of internal control because they originate in and are usually conducted by operating departments other than financial or accounting. Certain administrative controls may in large organizations be based on data or information such as operating budgets and reports of expenditures for plant additions furnished by accounting or financial departments. On the other hand, internal administrative controls, especially those of a physical nature, may replace or supplement other internal control procedures. While there are borderline cases, it is usually not difficult to distinguish between internal administrative controls which do, and those which do not, enhance those areas called internal accounting control or internal check.

15. Internal accounting control.—Controls which 'check the accuracy and reliability of accounting data' or, as my partners prefer to put it, controls which are designed to bring about accurate and suitable recording and summarization of authorized financial transactions, are described as 'internal accounting controls'. The responsibility for the installation, maintenance, and correction of faulty operation of such internal accounting controls is clearly that of the accounting (or financial) department. Equally clearly, such controls are of prime interest to the independent auditor who is to report on the fairness of the financial statements drawn from the records these controls are designed to protect. The auditor should, of course, consider whether seeming weaknesses in controls exercised through accounting means are compensated by physical, statistical or other forms of control or by close attention on the part of the owners of a business.

16. Internal check.—Internal check may be described as those accounting procedures or statistical, physical, or other controls which safeguard assets against defalcations or other similar irregularities. To the extent that such controls may be exercised through accounting procedures, or by proper assignment of duties within the accounting department or between the accounting department and other operating departments which furnish data for recording financial transactions, the accounting department is responsible for their installation and maintenance. Some of the usual forms of internal check of a physical nature such as fences, gates, watchmen, and inspection of outgoing material or personnel, are ordinarily the responsibility of other operating departments.

17. In the past little attention has been given to the differences between internal accounting control and internal check, both as to character and effect upon the auditor's procedures.

18. Internal accounting controls are usually present even in simple book-keeping systems operated for small businesses. They spring from the desire of every honest and capable book-keeper to follow generally accepted accounting principles, to avoid errors in his accounts, and to minimize the task of locating errors if present. As soon as the size of the business permits, there usually are adopted such procedures of accounting control as double entry book-keeping; controlling accounts for receivables, payables, and inventories; periodic trial balances; and cross-checking debits and credits on journal entries before posting. Book balances will be checked against outside sources when possible; for example, book balances of cash in banks will be reconciled with statements received from the bank, book inventories compared with physical counts, and possibly debtors' accounts circularized. As business grows and personnel is added, there is more necessity for official authorization and approval of book entries, and more employees are available among whom duties may be divided so that clerical accuracy is enhanced by double-check and cross-check. In addition, the book-keeper's staff promotes accuracy by numbering and accounting for documents such as sales orders and sales invoices, purchase orders and vendors' invoices, receiving reports, cheques, and numerous others. Such procedures are representative of internal accounting controls which are necessary or desirable to ensure accurate and suitable recording and summarization of authorized financial transactions; if there were no dishonesty to combat, convenience or efficient operation would be the sole criterion in assigning duties.

19. Unfortunately, experience teaches that not every book-keeper is honest; neither is every workman, store-keeper, salesman, or other person who has access to business assets. It is therefore necessary to provide controls to safeguard assets from defalcations or other similar irregularities. Such controls are encompassed in the term 'internal check'. For example, duties of accounting and financial personnel may be assigned in such a way that not only is accuracy enhanced through internal accounting controls, but also the arrangements of such assignments provide deterrents to wrongful actions. These arrangements provide for independent performance of incompatible functions and are one of the most important tools of internal check.

20. Broadly, custodianship functions are incompatible with record keeping for property; control account functions should be independent of related detail records; those who record and summarize financial transactions should be independent of other operating functions. Thus, the requirements of internal accounting control (to ensure the accurate and suitable recording of authorized financial transactions) are satisfied when the signer of a cheque has before him written evidence that the payments liquidate liabilities recorded by means of approved vouchers and that the data on the cheques have been compared with the vouchers; he then cancels the request for payment by appropriate means. But internal check requires that the signer be independent of persons who prepare vouchers for approval, approve vouchers for payment, and prepare cheques. A number of other procedures of internal check are frequently encountered. Among them are the independent accounting for pre-numbered documents, independent surprise counts of cash and securities, and the use of protective paper and writing devices for cheques. They have the common characteristic that they are not needed to ensure the accurate and suitable recording of authorized financial transactions by the honest book-keeper, but are desirable to deter or disclose defalcations or other similar irregularities.

21. Experienced auditors realize that the necessity for any specific internal control procedure will vary with the nature of the business and its circumstances. Some procedures may be impractical, and alternative methods may be devised. Others may cost more than they are worth. Good judgement again plays its part in internal controls to the needs of a specific business or organization.

The accountant's review of internal control

22. How is the study and evaluation of internal control done? I have learned, I trust, not to underestimate the importance of this task. Particularly on new engagements, the assignment of staff to this task is a most important assignment. In most cases, the audit programme cannot be outlined with confidence until this work is done. In my experience, it is only at this point that I can usually project an engagement in terms of number of staff assigned, locations to be visited, time of completion, man-hours and cost. One tedious way of accumulating this information is to review each important accounting procedure and to prepare a written commentary thereon. Such a record is, indeed, sometimes found among working papers; it can be, and it usually is, a very fine record. Whatever the merits of this type of record, we feel we can do an equally good job, in a better organized way and at substantially less cost, through the use of a questionnaire which is specifically developed for this use.

23. In a sense, the study and evaluation continue throughout the entire examination. More than once, I have tentatively approved an audit programme based upon an accounting procedure providing a satisfactory degree of control, only to find upon actual examination that the procedure was a dead letter and the purported controls did not exist. The audit programme accordingly had to be changed. Fortunately, this is not a common situation. The auditor obviously will want to obtain a good insight into and acquaintance with his client's system before his work is too far along. By so doing, he can make the most economic use of his time, can devote attention to those areas where attention is needed, and can reasonably forecast the completion of his work. He is thereby performing a better and more useful service to his client.

24. Perhaps it would be well to consider this task against a larger perspective. The starting-point in many audits is the review of available financial statements, both current ones and those for prior years; reports made by any prior auditors will also be studied. At this stage, the internal control questionnaire can be used. The first part of the questionnaire used in our office is directed to the first questions an auditor might thereafter ask his client:

- (1) Is a chart of accounts used?
- (2) Is the chart supplemented by definitions of items to be recorded in the various accounts?
- (3) Is an accounting manual in use?

As the auditor discusses these matters and scans any related written material in use, he cannot help but gain some impression about the accounting system. Does it make sense to handle accounting transactions in the manner prescribed? Will the financial statements resulting from the system produce reliable and suitable information? Likewise, the auditor cannot help but get some impression about the company's accountants. Do they appear to have an understanding of the accounting system? Do they explain it cogently? Do they give the appearance of being intelligent and skilled accountants? From his reading of available financial statements, the auditor cannot fail to gain from the form and content of the presentation some impression of the quality of the accounting organization producing them.

25. In performing these tasks, the auditor has made a modest start on a study and evaluation of internal control. It is our belief that the auditor should have working papers to support his examination; accordingly the working papers will also indicate what he thinks of the information he has received. The written responses to answers in the questionnaire can be adequate working papers for these parts of the examination.

26. From these preliminaries, the auditor will extend his questioning to other matters. What is the nature of the accounting organization? Does it provide for a well-defined assignment of duties and responsibilities? At what locations is significant accounting activity conducted? Which of these locations appear to require a visit by the auditor? I am sure the significance of these decisions is not lost on the readers. If the plants are at distant locations, the cost of doing the work is one important consideration; if the examination can be equally effectively completed at another location at less cost, this is a proper matter for the auditor to take into account. Many of the programmes I am familiar with for multi-location clients have schedules carrying forward, by years, the locations visited and the details of the programme followed. In these situations the rotation of visits among the locations is an effective manner of carrying out an audit, and of giving the client the benefit of periodic visits to locations that would not warrant such as part of each examination.

27. The accountant will certainly conclude that his review of internal control should cover the accounting activity not only at the company's headquarters but also those at the principal plants and branches. If there are large numbers of branches conducting a substantially identical activity under uniform accounting practices, such as in a bank or retail establishment, the auditor is apt to select a representative number of the branches for a visit, and test the effectiveness of the prescribed system by a detailed review and evaluation at the branches he visits.

What's in a Name – D.C.F. or P.V.?

IN the field of capital investment appraisal rapid advances are being made on both sides of the Atlantic. There are, however, some differences – particularly in terminology. That which in Britain is called discounted cash flow (D.C.F.) analysis is regarded by the Americans as a rather specialized form of present value (P.V.) analysis. An example will make this clear.

Suppose that an investment of £40,000 will bring in expected net cash flows of £10,000 a year for five years precisely. The American approach requires that an interest rate has been agreed in advance. If this rate is (say) 10 per cent, then the present value of the cash flows can be read off from the cumulative tables to be £37,910. As this figure is below the original capital amount, the investment is rejected. The British approach is to find that interest rate which, when applied to the cash flows, will make them equal the amount of the investment. In this particular case the rate is almost exactly 8 per cent. The problem then is to decide whether this rate gives an adequate return.

From the practical point of view, the D.C.F. computation is a little harder than P.V., since a number of preliminary calculations have to be made using different interest rates. The D.C.F. rate required will usually be part way between two interest rates shown in the tables, and the exact figure must be estimated or extrapolated.

The real difference in the two methods lies in the timing. In the American P.V. analysis, the cut-off rate is agreed first and then this rate is applied. In the British D.C.F. analysis, the appropriate rate is first calculated and then the decision is made as to whether this is adequate or not.

Derivation

In Britain the money market in the City has always been well aware of the importance of the time factor in large cash transactions and the significance of the interest rates that money can earn. Discounting is in the blood. Is this why D.C.F. is popular in the U.K., while across the Atlantic P.V. is used?

The real answer would appear to lie partly in the slightly different way that interest calculations are taught at American schools, and partly in the difference in the supply of bank credit and intermediate term funds.

The standard simple interest formula is:

$I = PTR$ , where  $R$  is the rate, expressed as a fraction,  $P$  the principal, and  $T$  the time in years. So that, for instance, the interest on £500 for three years at 4 per cent is

$$I = 500 \times 3 \times \frac{4}{100} = £60. \text{ The new sum } (S) \text{ is now}$$

$$£500 + £60 = £560.$$

$$\text{i.e. } S = P + I = P + PTR,$$

$$S = P(1 + TR).$$

This is a formula giving the sum ( $S$ ) to which  $P$  will accumulate.

American textbooks rewrite this as,

and then rephrase it to say that this formula now gives the present value ( $P$ ) of a sum ( $S$ ) at simple interest ( $R$ ),  $T$  years from now.

Precisely the same argument is used when the interest is compounded, i.e. added to the principal yearly. The formula in this case is,

and this is rewritten to give the present value,

$$P = \frac{S}{(1 + R)^T}$$

Credit in U.K. and U.S.

If we have a number of possible capital projects then that which gives the highest return (i.e. D.C.F. rate) will, ceteris paribus, be the one that is chosen. This approach will therefore be the best when cash is limited, and the problem is simply that of finding which project will put it to the best use. If, on the other hand, cash can be made available for any project giving an adequate return, then the P.V. approach, using a fixed cut-off rate, is the more appropriate.

To a certain extent these are the conditions which apply respectively in Britain and the United States. To comply with the frequent requests from the British Government to keep credit down, the joint-stock banks are fairly restrictive in their advances to British industry. Long-term financing from investors is also rather difficult to obtain. When corporation tax was introduced recently, it was soon realized that this tax gave an additional advantage to fixed interest bearing securities, since loan interest is an allowable deduction from taxable profits, and the previous advantage that shares enjoyed in that the tax deducted from dividend payments could be retained, no longer applied. Earlier this year the market was flooded with a large number of debenture issues. The available supply of money from institutions and private investors has now been mainly taken up and little remains.

The banking system in America is altogether different. The majority of banks are local, highly competitive, and commercially aggressive in their lending policy. This is in no way to decry the British system. Both banking systems fit in with the different commercial needs of their countries and serve them well.

American banks will wish to lend money if they are satisfied that a project is likely to lead to a good rate of return. Like all banking institutions they are concerned that their loans shall be reasonably secure, but above all they judge that a good management team will be able to exploit any worth-while capital project. When a new motorway was opened between two important commercial centres recently, the sites along the highway were eagerly sought after for many and widely differing forms of development. The local bank – renowned for its aggressive lending policy – sent its loan officers into the field with highly unusual rules. They were given carte blanche to lend up to a high figure on their own initiative. But if they turned a request for a loan down, all the relevant facts, together with their reasons for refusing the loan, had to be reported to the chief loan officer.

Normally, of course, money is not easy to obtain, even in the United States. But it is easier, and for firms with a background of success in a series of well-managed projects, the door is wide open. P.V. analysis is a more logical approach to use when any project giving a return above the standard 11 or 12 per cent cut-off rate can have money found for it.

Joint Diploma in Management Accounting Services

Report on the First Year's Progress

THE first formal report of the Joint Diploma Board covering its activities since it was formally constituted in June of last year has been submitted to the Councils of the participating bodies.

The Board had to create a completely new organization to run its affairs on behalf of the five accountancy bodies taking part in the scheme, for the award of the Joint Diploma in Management Accounting Services, but administrative preparations were soon completed and the scheme began officially on January 1st this year.

Part I Examination

Experienced professional men from industry, consultancy, public practice and the academic world were appointed to the examination board and a detailed syllabus, reading list and specimen questions were prepared. This part of the examination is intended to be taken at the age of 26 or 27 by candidates who have had two years' experience of management accounting services since qualifying, and over a thousand inquiries were received during the first three months of the scheme.

The first Part I examination was held from June 14th–16th and copies of the examination papers are now available from the Secretary who can also supply details of the next examination which is being held in February 1967.

Correspondence courses, specially designed for the Part I examination, will be available later this month or in September. It is hoped that evening classes will be provided in certain centres.

Part II Examination

Several hundred inquiries have been received from members of the participating bodies who were over 40 on January 1st, 1966, and who may be granted exemption from the Part I examination under the transitional provision of the scheme. Interviewing panels have met in London and Edinburgh to test candidates' experience and to examine them on their theses. A number of candidates have been allowed to offer, in the place of a thesis, some book or paper which they had previously published and the Joint Board intends that this arrangement should continue, provided the work offered is of a suitable standard and that its content lies within the Diploma syllabus. Original theses have been presented on a wide range of subjects including: 'Evaluation, financing and control of capital expenditure'; 'Computers as an aid to management'; 'Methods of dealing with the effect of fluctuating raw material prices on manufacturing costs' and 'Investment appraisal in the nationalized industries'.

Whilst candidates for the Part II examination will continue to be the 'over forties' until those who have passed the Part I examination are eligible, the Board expect that the 'normal' age of Part II candidates will be about 31–35 when the scheme has been operating for a couple of years.

The Joint Board have now awarded Diplomas to thirteen 'over forties' who have qualified in the Part II examination and to 248 Fellows of The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants who have passed that Institute's former examination in management accountancy.

Further information

The Secretary, Mr I. G. S. Groundwater, will be pleased to provide information on the scheme in response to inquiries by telephone, correspondence or personal visit to the Board's new offices at 73 Cheapside (Fifth Floor), London EC2. (Telephone 01-236 6654.)

FOR STUDENTS

Elements of Company Finance

ANY introductory study of company finance requires consideration of the capital structure of a company. Types of capital – shares, loans, debentures, factors to be considered when determining the capital structure, sources from which it is to be obtained; each of these aspects have to be considered.

The various types of capital may be defined as follows:

Authorized

This denotes the maximum share capital a company is able to issue and is stated in the memorandum of association of the company. This cannot be decreased except by consent of the court but it can be increased in accordance with the procedure set out in the company's articles of association, and stamp duty paid.

Issued

Issued capital is that part of the authorized capital which has been issued to shareholders for cash or other consideration. This latter term is used when shares are issued in exchange for assets, as in the case of the transfer of net assets of a partnership to a limited company, the partners receiving shares in exchange for the net assets. Shares can be issued in whatever denomination the directors decide, i.e. £1, 10s, 5s or even 1s and at a premium (this will be considered later).

Paid Up

Paid up capital is that part of the issued capital which has been paid for in cash or considered as paid up for a consideration other than cash. Issued capital is, on occasions, payable in instalments, such as part on application (i.e. when application is made for the shares), part on allotment (when the directors allot the shares to the successful applicants), and possibly at a later date a final payment is requested which is termed a 'call'. On occasions a member fails to meet his obligation when called upon to do so, such as when a call is made, and then these sums appear on the face of the company's balance sheet as 'calls in arrear' and as a deduction from the issued capital.

It is the issued capital, as reduced by the calls in arrear, which makes up the figure of paid up capital. Applicants may apply for more shares than they are allotted and these sums can be considered as carried forward against future calls (if authorized by the articles of association), these being termed 'calls in advance'.

Loan Capital

Capital raised by way of loans – secured or unsecured – or debentures; these are sometimes classified in a company's balance sheet as 'long-term liabilities'.

Circulating or Working Capital

This comprises 'net assets', being current assets less current liabilities. It is that part of the capital structure which is invested in the net current assets, being those which circulate round with the daily transactions of the business, but retain their identity.

Liquid Capital

Cash or sums held on deposit at the bank or in current account; also short-term loans or bills receivable.

The capital, as outlined, can be presented in the following form:

SHARE CAPITAL	Authorized £	Issued and fully paid £
5,000 5 per cent cumulative preference shares of £1 each .. .. .	5,000	5,000
Ordinary shares of £1 each 10s paid ..	50,000	25,000
	<hr/> 55,000	<hr/> 30,000
Less: Calls in arrear .. .. .		100
		<hr/> 29,900
Calls received in advance .. .. .		<hr/> 2,000
		<hr/> <hr/>

Classes of shares

The share capital of a company can be divided into various classes which form the 'capital structure'. The particular form requires careful consideration which, from a student's point of view, will be outlined later. The following are different classes of shares:

Preference shares

- (a) Cumulative preference shares.
- (b) Participating preference shares.
- (c) Redeemable preference shares.
- (d) Cumulative participating preference shares.

Ordinary Shares

- (a) Preferred ordinary shares.
- (b) Deferred ordinary shares.

*Deferred sharesPreference shares

Preference shares are preferential as to dividend, i.e., must have their dividend paid before any is paid on the ordinary or deferred shares; but unless it is clearly stated in the terms of issue, these shares do not carry a prior right to repayment on a winding-up. It is, however, more frequently found that the rights attaching to these shares are priority both as to dividend (in any year but not necessarily in respect of any past year when a dividend was not paid), and repayment of capital in a winding-up. Students must not forget that dividends are only payable at the discretion of the directors who must act in the best interests of the company. The directors can declare a dividend partly out of past accumulated profits if those of the current year are not sufficient to meet such dividend.

(a) Cumulative preference shares

These shares carry the right to have any arrears of dividend paid before any can be paid on ordinary or deferred shares. The Companies Act 1948 requires a company to state by way of note either on the face of the balance sheet or on an attached report, the amount of any arrears of dividend.

(b) Participating preference shares

These shares have a right to participate in a further distribution after they have received their dividend, and the ordinary shares have had a dividend paid on them at a fixed rate, e.g.  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent preference dividend plus 50 per cent participation in any distribution over 15 per cent to the ordinary shareholders. Therefore if a dividend of 20 per cent was declared on the ordinary shares, the participating preference shareholders would be entitled to an additional dividend of  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent (50 per cent of  $(20-15)$  5). They do not carry cumulative dividend rights. This type of share is uncommon.

(c) Redeemable preference shares

This class of share, unlike any other type, is redeemable according to the terms of issue. Since this would amount to a reduction of capital, conditions are laid down before redemption can take place; these are set out in the Companies Act 1948, (as they were in the Companies Act 1929, but the latter Act modified the conditions).

These conditions which must be met before a redemption can be made are briefly as follows:

- (1) This type of share must be authorized by the company's articles of association.
- (2) They can only be redeemed (a) out of profits of the company which would otherwise have been available for distribution as a dividend, or (b) from the proceeds of a fresh issue of shares raised specifically to replace the shares to be redeemed.
- (3) Any premium payable on redemption must be provided for out of profits of the company or from the company's share premium account. The premium is the sum at which the shares are redeemable in excess of par, e.g. £1 shares redeemable at 25s then 5s would be the premium.
- (4) When the shares are to be redeemed out of profits which would have been available for dividend, such sums must be transferred to a reserve fund to be known as a 'capital redemption reserve fund'. This fund can only be reduced by consent of the Court in the same manner as a reduction of capital. The fund can be utilized for the issue of bonus shares, fully paid up. (Bonus issues and accounting aspects of redeemable preference shares will be discussed in a later article.)

The company must state on the face of the balance sheet any part of the issued capital that consists of redeemable preference shares and the earliest date on which the company has power to redeem those shares.

These shares are a combination of both cumulative and participating preference shares, i.e. are entitled to cumulative dividends, and also further participate in distributions.

Ordinary shares

Ordinary shares are frequently the largest part of a company's capital and if there are no deferred shares in the capital structure and they become entitled to the whole of any surplus after payment of any preference dividend, these shares constitute the 'equity'.

During the years of inflation since the war, this type of share has been attractive to those who required a 'hedge' against inflation but they can become vulnerable in times of uncertainty.

The ordinary share as part of the capital structure will be considered in a later article.

(a) Preferred ordinary shares

This type of share ranks prior to ordinary shares but after preference shares as regards dividend.

If there are any deferred shares in the capital structure, deferred ordinary shares rank for dividend prior to those but after a dividend on the ordinary shares.

Deferred shares rank, both for dividend and capital repayment on a winding-up, after all other types of share capital. Frequently these shares are issued to vendors as part consideration on conversion to a company from a partnership or on a take-over. These shares could be very speculative but also possess considerable value if the company is successful both in growth and profit-wise.

Reviews

Management Control Systems

by ROBERT N. ANTHONY, JOHN DEARDEN and RICHARD F. VANCIL

Richard D. Irwin Inc., Homewood, Illinois. $12.75.

Published under the joint editorship of three eminent American academic accountants occupying professorial posts at the Harvard University Graduate School of Business Administration (one of whom has since joined the Federal Administration in Washington), this book combines readings on various aspects of management control techniques with a series of case studies which demonstrate their practical application to typical business situations.

In their preface the authors explain that their intention has been to provide the material for a one-semester course for students who are studying management control in depth, although a knowledge of accounting or finance is not considered to be a prerequisite to a full understanding of its content.

The basic concept is very much in the classic pattern of the American approach to management training and education, with the case studies being drawn from the files of the Harvard Business School. It is admirably suited to the formalized study of business administration, and until such time as British writers have been able to amass and edit similar volumes, it could prove to be a valuable source of reference material for use in business schools on this side of the Atlantic.

For the accountancy student who is preparing for his management accounting examination or the busy industrial accountant who has to allocate his precious reading time to maximum effect, the sheer volume of illustrative material contained in this book might well prove to be formidable deterrents – but this is not intended as a criticism as, in truth, the authors have written for an audience that is likely to have greater facilities for the necessarily profound approach that is required by case study methods.

However, the pattern of the chapters is such that the choosy reader can pick his place and subject at random, without detracting from the true value of the book as a systematic course of instruction.

Taxation of Capital Gains

by PERCY F. HUGHES, F.C.I.S., and K. R. TINGLEY, A.A.C.C.A.
Taxation Publishing Co Ltd, London. 55s net.

One salutes with deference the authors of a book of nearly seven hundred pages which deals so exhaustively with both the short-term gains tax (Case VII of Schedule D) and capital gains tax; the more so in view of the many arithmetical examples which accompany the text.

The first chapter deals with the general scope of the two taxes and is followed by nine chapters on short-term gains which constitute Part I, and twelve chapters on 'long-term gains' constituting Part II. The short-term gains legislation is reproduced in Appendix I; that relating to the capital gains tax in Appendix II; while a third appendix sets out the supplementary legislation for capital gains tax administration. The type is clear and straightforward and altogether the book has been well produced.

While by no means the last word has yet been said about this extraordinarily complicated legislation, one questions only with diffidence anything in the book. However, it is suggested that the conclusions arrived at about the interaction of sections 17 and 82 of the Finance Act 1965 in relation to section 14 of the Finance Act 1962 are open to doubt. In particular (in the last paragraph on page 143) there are references to 'chargeable gains' and 'chargeable gain' as though these were the same thing, but on referring to the legislation it seems that they mean two different things. Moreover, some paragraphs in the book which, prima facie, are expounding provisions in the Acts, in fact reproduce them almost verbatim. Nevertheless there can be no doubt that the book will be of very considerable value to tax advisers and practitioners.

Organization and Manpower Planning

by GORDON McBEATH

Business Publications Ltd, London. 55s net.

This wide-ranging work seeks to explain the integration of management's planning of future manpower requirements with the personal problems of the employee. Starting with examples of staff and line organizations and their special co-relationships, it moves on to stress the fundamental need for a flexible and far-reaching policy of recruitment and subsequent development. Implementation of the policy, and the psychological stresses requiring consideration, are well illustrated. Chapter nine, on career planning, highlights effectively the alternative means of giving scope to the 'highflyers' by looking ahead to the position envisaged in one, two, and five years' time.

Essential to the progress of any successful organization is its ability to help employees to feel secure in their future careers, and the later portion of the book deals comprehensively with appropriate management techniques. Job-grading and performance appraisal – sophisticated aids whose value is yet far from fully appreciated – receive full treatment. Management of objective, attained by way of joint liaison between supervisors and subordinates at all levels in order to improve employee performance, is closely examined.

On the debit side, some important areas – such as the educational system or the effect of the computer – receive rather limited attention, and a number of the charts pose several provocative questions. On page 98, for example, showing the build-up of an electronics division, the first appointment to the personnel section is shown in the seventh month, when twenty-four out of the final seventy-eight employees have already been recruited.

All in all, however, Mr McBeath's book is highly informative and well deserves perusal.

De La Rue

THE accounts are presented in a different form this year compared with previous years, with the intention of setting out certain aspects of the company's affairs with more clarity for the benefit of shareholders. With these words Mr A. G. Norman opens his report to shareholders in The De La Rue Co Ltd. De La Rue's standard of shareholder reporting is exceptionally high, not only in the annual report but in the provision of full quarterly figures showing sales as well as profits.

The quarterly figures, it may be noted in passing, show sales in terms of home, export and overseas and profits on a pre-tax and net basis. The full accounts for the year to last March were dated July 4th which, for an organization of De La Rue's size and geographical complications, is prompt reporting.

In the latest accounts the view in the profit and loss account is, as Mr Norman says, concentrated on 'how the profits for the year have been dealt with and to present, as simply as possible, the effect on the dividends of the company of the withholding tax'. There is an abundance of information in the rest of the report showing how the profits were earned.

Sales and profits

A table headed 'The Year 1965-66', included in the reprint, contains a summary of sales and the source of profits, while in the chairman's review of each main part of the group—the three 'international' organizations—sales and pre-tax profits (with comparisons) are repeated, plus profit as a percentage of sales, average total funds employed and profit as a percentage of those funds.

The sales and profits view is further intensified in 'Financial Information 1957-66' which breaks down sales under three headings: United Kingdom, exports and overseas companies. This table also shows profit as a percentage of sales, average total funds and average total shareholders' funds, and sets out earnings per share—in the past year 2s 4d against 1s 9½d; retentions per share, 1s 0½d (11d); dividend per share 1s 3½d final gross (10½d net); and cover for dividend 1.8 times (2 times).

Shareholders are also reminded that the 'Doomsday' price of the company's ordinary shares was 28s 6d. The price was 32s 6d ex dividend when shareholders received the accounts.

Different look

Under the heading 'General Information', shareholders are given another view of the group's operations, which is much easier to read than describe. The detail shows the number of people the group employs in the world

THE DE LA RUE COMPANY LIMITED AND SUBSIDIARY COMPANIES NOTES TO THE ACCOUNTS

These notes are part of the Accounts and are given to conform with the requirements of the Companies Act 1948.

1 Basis of Consolidation

The Consolidated Accounts at 31st March 1966 include the results and the state of affairs of subsidiary companies in the Group, as follows:

(a) As respects all U.K. companies for 53 weeks to 2nd April 1966 (a direction of the Board of Trade under Section 152 (2) of the Companies Act 1948 has been given) excepting two companies, not previously consolidated, whose Accounts cover 15 months to the same date.

(b) As respects overseas companies, to avoid delay in presenting the Accounts, for 12 months to 31st December 1965, excepting:

(i) three companies—two for 15 months, and one from incorporation, to 31st March 1966, in order to include transactions relevant to these Accounts;

(ii) one company—12 months to 31st January 1966, to conform with local requirements.

Nine overseas subsidiaries are not consolidated because, in the opinion of the Directors, their consolidation would be of no real value to the members of the company due to the insignificant amounts involved. The aggregate losses of these companies, so far as concerns Members of The De La Rue Company are £2,800 for the year to 31st December 1965 and £100 profit in respect of previous financial years.

The comparative figures do not include particulars of subsidiaries consolidated this year which were acquired or formed prior to 27th March 1965, but were not consolidated last year.

and where — 11,096 all told, with 7,687 in the United Kingdom and Eire, 2,013 in Western Europe, 192 in Asia and the Far East, 409 in Australasia and 795 in the Americas.

Total sales and total funds employed are also shown on a global and geographical basis over the areas already stated, plus Eastern Europe, Africa and the Middle East. If all this is not enough there is a folder in a pocket inside the back cover of the report giving the names, boards and function of every subsidiary and associated company in the group and the percentage of the holding company's interest.

Basically, the De La Rue organization is in three groups: Formica International in laminated plastics, Potterton International in domestic and other boilers and Thomas De La Rue International in the 'security' industry, including banknote printing. In addition there is De La Rue Bull Machines in computers, the Frigistor Group in thermoelectric systems, and M. J. de Goeje in electronic quality control machines.

Employed overdrafts

The chairman sums up the changes in the De La Rue balance sheet by saying that 'reference is made to funds employed instead of to capital employed, as in the past, and the full amount of all bank overdrafts in the group is included under this heading'. The latter point is still unusual but is becoming accepted and surely it has logic to commend it. Inclusion of bank overdraft in the manner followed by De La Rue becomes logical once capital employed becomes funds employed. Can a company raise a bank overdraft and not employ the funds?

A point about the De La Rue accounts which cannot be shown in the reprint is colour. The usual form is for the latest figures to be printed in black and comparisons in colour or italics, but De La Rue shows the latest figures in blue and the comparisons in black and this gives rise to an interesting psychological exercise.

The eye has become used to latest figures black and comparisons coloured, but seeing the De La Rue accounts presented the other way round colourwise does not create any problems at all — even at first glance. Excellent print and expert layout must have a lot to do with it.

Charged to advertising

THE Mecca company's annual meeting, apart from complying with the Act, is an exercise in public relations. Mecca has the facilities for the exercise in the form of the Empire Ballroom, Leicester Square, and in other ballrooms in the provinces to which the proceedings of this year's meeting were relayed by closed circuit television. It is estimated that this year's meeting was attended directly and indirectly by some five thousand shareholders who were treated to lunch.

There were probably many attending the feeding of this particular five thousand who wondered what it was all costing. There was one who wondered even before the event and put his question in writing beforehand. In these days of equality for all and 'I have my rights', perhaps the question was inevitable.

Equally inevitable was the fact that the questioner did not get the answer he wanted. He was not told how much the affair cost but he was at least told how Mecca view the annual get-together. The cost of what is very much a publicity event is logically charged to 'advertising' — and why not?

CITY NOTES

FOR the time being the stock-market may have seen the worst of the equity fall. Now that the politicians have packed their holiday bags, the stock-market could benefit from political respite and a technical rally in equities could ensue. But against the current economic and industrial background it would be foolhardy to trust such a rally too far – or trust it at all, in fact.

Much has been made politically of the 'selectivity' of the current squeeze but what is put forward politically rarely works out in effect. Housing, for example, is said not to be affected but there are already very firm indications of a sharp fall in house building 'starts' and the credit pressure on building companies, particularly the smaller ones, will be intense enough to put many of them out of business.

Political attempts to suggest that the effect of the limitation of bank lending will not be extremely severe must be taken at their political and not their face value. Within the stock-market it is noticeable that estimates of the likely 'bottom' of the equity market are being revised downwards.

One stockbroking firm has been bold enough publicly to forecast a bottom in the region of 275 for The Financial Times Ordinary Share Index which means a further drop of 40 points or so. There is an, admittedly minority, opinion forecasting even a heavier fall than that.

LATEST figures from Lloyd's of London show that near unprofitability in insurance is not the monopoly of the insurance companies. The insurance industry as a whole suffers in the main from a surfeit of competition which means that premiums, because of the tightness of the market, are prevented from being raised to a possibly profitable level. That, coupled with the rising crime rate, inflated claims and the continued poor performance of the North American market, has meant a thin insurance time for an uncomfortably long period.

It is possible that this lean time may drive more of the upstart competitors out of the industry and thereby assist the return to a more commercially viable market. In the immediate future, however, there is little prospect of relief particularly since both Lloyd's and the insurance companies have reluctantly agreed to toe the Government line on prices.

* * * *

THE London stockbrokers, de Zoete & Gorton, have revised a study first made several years ago on changes in Bank rate and movements in long-term interest rates. Yields on British Government undated securities are currently higher than they have ever been since the earliest recorded dealings took place in 1931. The previous highest levels were in 1961, half-way through the current period of high interest rates. Before that, the longest period of high yields was in the twelve years 1796-1807 during the Napoleonic War. That was the only time that interest rates stayed high for so long.

During periods of high interest rates, the brokers point out, high rates 'were always expected to continue but the reversion to lower yields followed in a relatively short time'. Periods of high interest rates are not a new phenomenon but, although the brokers do not say so, there is an uncomfortable feeling that the current high interest rate period may break the Napoleonic War record for length.

Industrial Reorganization Corporation

SIR, — The doubts expressed by Mr Colin Perry (July 23rd issue) regarding the modus operandi of the Industrial Reorganization Corporation do not exhaust the criticisms which have been made of its apparent intended functions.

It has been said that its principal purpose will be to encourage and bring about mergers and amalgamations, but judging by the past performance of some of the larger industrial and commercial companies there is little reason to doubt that they are well capable of meeting this need. Indeed, Sir Frank Kearton's own company, Courtaulds Ltd, has been a notable provider of development capital to firms operating in industries in which it has an interest. Surely, then, it cannot be the intention that the I.R.C. should take over the dying ducks which others have considered are not worth saving?

The private enterprise sector of the economy which is probably most in need of a friendly helping hand is that inhabited by the smaller companies, which even now are not overwhelmed with potential providers of capital. However, the Treasury's recent directions to the joint stock banks have given these firms little reason to expect that the Government will show awareness or sympathy for their capital requirements, and if they happen to fall within the category of 'close companies', as most of them do, they are apparently regarded as being almost beyond the pale.

Why, indeed, an Industrial Reorganization Corporation? Perhaps it's just another of those recent non-events which appear to be doing something but are in fact doing nothing.

Yours faithfully,

DESMOND GOCH, F.A.C.C.A., A.M.B.I.M.

Schedule F

SIR, — I have recently seen the first of the monthly returns which are required to be completed in respect of dividends, distributions, annual payments, etc. (Form C T61). I find difficulty in understanding how these forms are to be completed, in spite of the notes which are printed with them, and I think it a safe bet that 99 per cent of taxpayers will be unable to understand what is required statutorily of them in respect of this form. I do not know how accountants or the Revenue are going to cope with it.

If a return is late, is interest to be charged on the tax when it ought to have been due? If so, will it be remitted if a tax credit becomes available for set-off by receipt of franked investment income, tax deducted?

How much time will be spent on part B of the form which requires completion in respect of 'distributions which are not money payments', and 'payments as to which there is doubt whether they constitute distributions' (this is the wording used on the form)?

How much detail is going to be required with supporting evidence in respect of other items on the form, such as annual payments and receipts, tax deducted? How much of this will duplicate information given separately in computations with accounts?

Yours faithfully,

J. ROSS, F.C.A.

The Computer Audit

SIR, — Mr T. W. McRae in his article 'Need we audit the program?' (June 25th issue) raises some extremely interesting points which indicate the need for a more positive approach to the new problems of audit created by the widespread use of computers for accountancy.

The computer as used for accountancy is only a fast piece of machinery which has speeded up and in some cases improved, clerical procedures formerly carried out manually or by conventional punched-card equipment. The computer program can be regarded as a detailed list of the steps necessary to achieve the requirements of the system in much the same way as written clerical procedures or punched boards served former systems.

Mr McRae asked 'how can one audit the system without auditing the program?' If we accept that the computer program is a machine procedure list designed and compiled to accept and validate data and to produce output in the desired form, this merely becomes a tool of the system like any other formalized list of instructions. The test of the validity of any computer program is if it produces correct output from data presented to it. This can be achieved by the intelligent use of test data designed to explore all the exceptional areas built into the program.

The program is only one part of the system which should also include external control functions designed to ensure that data presented to the program is registered, providing a cross reference back to prime documents, and to calculate control totals for checking the values shown on the output. The auditor can satisfy himself that these control procedures are adequate and that the system is acceptable without a detailed appreciation of the computer program.

This does not mean that some computer managers would not welcome auditors who were able to understand programs and the systems they serve. The ideal situation would be if a member of the firm of external auditors could be allowed to work with the company's computer team on all accounting projects, as part of his training. Failing this, all teams working on accounting should include at least one full-time member seconded from the accounts department. This would ensure that all such systems satisfy the realistic requirements of the auditors and that the computer department, always subject to a high degree of staff turnover, does not become the exclusive source of knowledge of the detailed workings of modern accounting systems.

I believe that a major factor in the current difficulties of professional auditors regarding computer systems is a barrier of communication. Both computer personnel and accountants use the jargon of their profession which tends to confuse both sides. Many accountants are extremely interested in the use of computers but rather overawed by the complicated terms used by computer people. Surely the Institutes should now consider the introduction of some computer education as part of the basic training of all accountants.

Yours faithfully,
G. A. HOOKER, A.C.W.A.
(Computer Manager).

Assistance for Exporters

SIR, - In an article in The Accountant of July 23rd, ('Government Assistance for British Exporters', by L. H. Trimby, F.C.A.), Industrial & Commercial Finance Corporation Ltd is referred to as a Government Department. This is a misconception which is widely held but has no basis in fact. I.C.F.C. is owned by the clearing banks and the Bank of England and is a commercial organization with no recourse to Government funds.

Residential Centre for School Leavers

SIR, - Would you kindly permit us through the columns of The Accountant to bring to the notice of your readers, 'The School Leavers' Residential and Advice Centre', to be opened in October at the headquarters of the Hyelm Movement.

At this season of the year parents all over the country are faced with the difficult problem of finding suitable accommodation in London for their sons who left school at the end of the summer term and will shortly be entering upon a professional or business career or continuing their studies. What is believed to be the first of its kind and situated within easy distance of the City and West End, the Centre will cater specially for these lads.

The aim of the Centre is threefold:

- (1) To offer accommodation at reasonable charges, when beds are available, and to give advice on outside accommodation.
- (2) To help lads leaving school to adjust themselves to the challenge and conditions of the outside world.

- (3) To assist the individual to overcome loneliness and boredom during leisure hours, and especially at the weekend, by promoting cultural, social and sporting activities within the movement.

We shall be pleased to forward full details of our new project to any interested reader of The Accountant who will telephone Hampstead 9529 or write to 'Hyelm', 79 Fitzjohn's Avenue, London NW3.

My Governing Council would be most grateful for your co-operation in this connection.

Yours truly,
ARTHUR J. WEST,
Founder.

Registration

SIR, - I have been interested to read in your columns the letters of Mr Robert Barlow (July 23rd issue) and Mr R. H. S. Beacham, (July 30th issue) on the related subjects of registration and the structure of the profession.

The question of the unity of the profession, coupled with registration, and the idea of 'speaking with one voice' for the accountancy profession as a whole is not new; it engaged the minds of accountants generally in the years immediately following the Second World War. At that time, I suggested it would be 'a gracious act for the Institute to take over the Society', rather than indiscriminate integration of the entire profession.

It will be interesting to see what the various bodies decide today. Mr Beacham is right in saying that the profession calls for diversification rather than simple integration. The first thing perhaps is to form a joint examining board of the two leading interests, that is to say the Chartered Institutes and the Cost and Works Accountants. It should be possible to devise a scheme by which the professional members of the Association are absorbed by the Institutes of Chartered Accountants, and the commercial and industrial members taken over by The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants.

It should then be possible for the joint board of the Chartered and the Cost and Works Accountants to create, if necessary, three qualifications, involving separate examinations and separate specialist syllabuses. The qualifications might well be:

- F.C.P.A. - Fellow (or associate) of The Institute of Chartered Professional Accountants.
- F.C.M.A. - Fellow (or associate) of The Institute of Chartered Management Consultants.
- F.C.C.A. - Fellow (or associate) of The Institute of Chartered Cost Accountants.

To these, of course, may be added Municipal Treasurers. It would seem that the creation of a separate chartered qualification for the different fields of accountancy noted by Mr Beacham should meet the requirements and aspirations of the great majority of accountants; at the same time rendering such half-measures as the Certificate in Management Information redundant and unnecessary. The syllabuses should be distinct and separate, but it should be possible for a person to acquire any or all of them in any order.

At a later stage, the Chartered Accountants and the Cost and Works Accountants could enter into a closer association of a permanent nature. Whilst all this may seem rather comprehensive and involving many difficulties, it would seem that the end justifies the means.

In regard to registration, surely accountants are missing the point. The Inland Revenue accepts, and may continue to accept, accounts of various kinds submitted by persons other than members of the recognized accountancy bodies. If the Revenue continues to do so, the objects of registration will be defeated; if the Revenue sets an example by refusing to accept any accounts of any kind other than those compiled by properly recognized practising accountants, then registration becomes superfluous.

By legislation, rule or otherwise, the remedy lies at the door of the Inland Revenue and the Government.

Yours faithfully,

KENNETH WEST,

Football League Competition

SIR, - Last season the Temco Football Club (which is made up of members of the staff of Temple, Gothard & Co) played a number of enjoyable friendly games of football against other firms of chartered accountants in the London area. It was suggested on these occasions that it might be a good idea if these games could be put on to a more regular footing and a football league competition started.

Our idea is that a number of firms should join the league and play one game against all other teams in the league, and also that there be a cup knock-out competition between the members of the league. Games would be played on Sunday afternoons or at some other mutually suitable time. If eight teams joined the league, each team will play a minimum of eight matches and a maximum of ten matches.

Last season we managed to hire pitches as required from the G.L.C. in the Croydon area and no doubt this would be acceptable to the majority of firms.

Any firm interested in joining the league is asked to write to me as soon as possible. It is appreciated that a number of firms may not be able to field a full side but should there be any firm who have five or six players would they also write to me with a view to two or three firms amalgamating to form one team.

A. W. MEDLOCK,

?Clue to the missing person

Staff who don't get Luncheon Vouchers invariably don't have an adequate lunch. Even just 3/- a day can help towards a mid-day meal, which is why this national Welfare Scheme has achieved so much. So why don't all employers give Luncheon Vouchers? Well, there's no reason why they shouldn't. The scheme is applicable to small and large concerns alike and to staff of all kinds—from shop workers to executives.

LUNCHEON VOUCHERS LTD

22 GOLDEN SQ · LONDON W1 · TELEPHONE REGent 5711 & 0693

Luncheon Vouchers provide an added incentive in the retention and recruitment of staff, for whilst they cost employees nothing, they do ensure a regular lunch—at any one of over 13,000 restaurants throughout the British Isles. Nearly 19,000 employers have adopted the Luncheon Voucher Service. No missing persons for lunch on their staff.

If you want the full facts about Luncheon Vouchers, send for our brochure.

Industrial Development Act

THE Industrial Development Act came into effect on Friday of last week. It comprises part of the overall planning machinery being evolved by the Government and which, in this case, is defined as providing 'a more positive system of investment incentives to improve the efficiency of those parts of the economy which contribute most directly to economic growth and the balance of payments, and to encourage development in the parts of the country where it is most needed'.

The Act comprises four parts of which the first three are of general interest. The first deals with the new system of cash grants for the acquisition of approved capital assets, i.e. plant and machinery for use in Great Britain for carrying out qualifying processes in the manufacturing, constructive and extractive industries, as well as for research in those processes. Payment of the grant is to be made at the rate of 20 per cent, but for plant and machinery installed in the development areas, the rate is doubled to 40 per cent. Payment of the grant is not dependent on whether the asset was made in Britain or abroad, although except for ships and hovercraft the asset must be provided for use in Britain.

As forecast in this journal it was inevitable that the Government would take powers to vary the rates of grant and add to the range of eligible assets. The Board of Trade is also empowered to specify conditions and penalties. Both these provisions are the logical development of any scheme of Government intervention in the economy. Industry and their financial advisers will be pleased to learn that it is proposed to publish this autumn an 'informative' booklet giving 'guidance to industry' about the eligibility of processes and assets on which grants may be claimed.

Part II of the Act extends the powers already existing under the Local Employment Act and, in particular, to enable the Board of Trade to use such powers in the development areas. These areas, defined by the Development Areas Order (S.I. 1966 No. 1032), are those parts of Britain where, in the opinion of the Board of Trade, special measures are necessary to encourage the growth and proper distribution of industry. These development areas supersede the development districts which were designated under the Local Employment Act 1960 and now cease to exist, although all the latter districts with the exception of Bridlington, Rhyl and Gunnislake are included in the new areas.

Apart from the larger cash grants to firms installing plant in these areas, the following benefits will also be available. Under the Local Employment Act, factories for rent or sale may be provided on favourable terms; building grants of 25 per cent, or under section 17 of the Act grants of 35 per cent may be given for certain new projects. In addition, there may be other financial assistance through the intervention of the Board of Trade Advisory Committee.

Part III of the Act makes some extensions to the industrial development certificate control whereby, for instance, the area within an industrial building used for storage as distinct from production may be limited. In addition, the certificate may specify that the development is to be carried out within a certain time by or on behalf of the firm to which the certificate is issued.

Henceforth I.D.C. certificates are to be required for all the floor space in industrial buildings, and not just the production areas as hitherto. The I.D.C. application forms have now been revised and such forms may be obtained from the nearest Board of Trade Regional Office.

While no one will deny the need to ensure that all sections of the community shall enjoy economic prosperity, there is more than one method of dealing with what used to be termed, with justice, the depressed areas. It is highly debatable whether the administration of such complex legislation which, as the past record so clearly shows must inevitably proliferate, is the best means of dealing with this problem.

FINANCE ACT 1966

The War on Tax Advantages

IT is now six years since the previous Government introduced a general omnibus attack on devices to obtain tax advantages on the periphery of the more closely defined dividend-stripping techniques.

The attack took the form of section 28 of the Finance Act 1960, a section which underwent drastic alteration at both the committee stage and the report stage of the Act. Broadly speaking it gives the Revenue blanket power to counteract 'tax advantages' obtained or obtainable in consequence of a transaction in securities, and in any of the four sets of circumstances set out as paragraphs (a) to (d) of section 28 (2).

Sometimes anti-avoidance provisions, although apparently frightening, are discovered to be without teeth because of the ease with which transactions can be arranged to avoid them. In this respect, section 28 is by no means typical. The two cases on it which have come before the English Courts have shown that the section has even bigger teeth than was first thought, and that they bite deep.

This does not mean that there were no weaknesses in the drafting of section 28; it had to be tightened up in 1962. For instance, the ATTORNEY-GENERAL in 1962 had, we think, embarrassed the Revenue by boldly asserting that a winding-up was not a transaction in securities even as widely defined in section 43 (4) (i) of the Finance Act 1960. Section 25 (5) of the Finance Act 1962 directed that a tax advantage obtained in consequence of the combined effect of a transaction in securities and a liquidation was to be deemed to be obtained in consequence of a transaction in securities. At the same time the Revenue clearly had doubts as to whether section 28 was adequately drafted to impose tax on a man in respect of his wife's transactions. Section 25 (4) of the 1962 Act dealt with that by introducing some very involved wording.

When the Finance Act 1965 introduced corporation tax, it was realized that some consequential amendments to section 28 would be necessary and these are to be found in section 63 and in paragraph 15 of Part I of Schedule 15 of the later Act. Some general provisions in section 63 (5) were no doubt intended to have effect on the old section 28 although not mentioning it. Paragraph 15 of Schedule 15 deals specifically with section 28. It helps to follow new provisions in this year's Finance Act if paragraph 15 is set out. It reads:

'15. In the Finance Act 1960:

- (a) in section 28 (2) for the reference to section 256 (2) and (3) of the Income Tax Act 1952 there shall be substituted a reference to paragraph 3 of Schedule 18 to this Act; and
- (b) for section 28 (1) proviso there shall be substituted:

"Provided that there shall be disregarded any amount received by a company by way of dividend from an associated company in so far as the dividend is paid out of income arising to the company paying it since the two companies became associated companies, and Schedule 17 to the Finance Act 1965 shall with the necessary modifications apply for determining the extent to which the dividend was so paid"; and

- (c) in section 29 (power to obtain information) and in the definition of "tax advantage" in section 43 (4) (g), the references to income tax shall include corporation tax; and (without prejudice to any general provisions of this Act for the continuity of income tax and corporation tax) in relation to tax advantages related to corporation tax the said section 28 shall apply to transactions taking place before the charge to corporation tax becomes effective'.

It has since been discovered that paragraph (c) above is or may be defective, because of the peculiar provisions dealing with distributions.

If a company makes a payment which is a 'distribution', two separate tax consequences follow. In the first place, that payment cannot be allowed as a deduction in computing profit for corporation tax purposes. While the rate is 40 per cent this means that to pay a distribution of £100 the company must earn £167.

The second tax consequence is that the company must deduct standard rate tax at 8s 3d in the £ from the £100, i.e. £41 5s, and it must pay this over to the Inland Revenue, subject to such rights to set off which it may have in respect of income tax deducted from payments made to it. Thus, in order to get £58 15s into the hands of an individual, it must earn £167.

Now, in the ordinary way, the income tax is a matter of indifference to the company: it is a mere conduit pipe between the individual entitled to the £100 and the Inland Revenue. Suppose now that a device is entered into under which the individual still obtains £58 15s but in such manner that it is not a distribution, and accordingly the company does not have to pay £41 5s to the Inland Revenue. The tax advantage, if any, in relation to the standard rate tax, is to the company instead of to the individual. Of course, if he is a surtax payer he may at the same time escape surtax on the £100 which might otherwise be payable (in which case the company's original £167 of earnings dwindles still further).

Can it be said that the individual has obtained an advantage in respect of £41 5s which he has not received? The answer would seem to be 'no'. But under the Finance Act 1966 he can now be charged on it. This is because of section 39 (1) which expands the already wide definition of 'tax advantage' as follows:

'39 (1) - For the purposes of the definition of tax advantage in section 43 (4) (g) of the Finance Act 1960, it shall be assumed that a person who might have received from a company any dividend or other distribution (as defined for the purposes of the Corporation Tax Acts) would have borne the income tax chargeable under Schedule F which the company would have had to account for under section 47 (3) of the Finance Act 1965 in respect of the distribution, and an assessment under section 28 (3) of the Finance Act 1960 to counteract a tax advantage consisting of the avoidance or reduction of an assessment to income tax which would be payable by a company under the said section 47 (3) in respect of a distribution may be made under Case VI of Schedule D on a person other than the company, and may be so made in addition to any assessment to counteract a tax advantage in respect of surtax'.

Suppose now that in the particular case the company would not, in fact, have had to pay the £41 5s over to the Revenue because there was a set-off available to it under the provisions in Schedule 12 to the Finance Act 1965 about distributions. Section 39 (2) makes it clear that this set-off is to be ignored when the Case VI assessment is made on the individual or other person.

When section 28 was originally drafted, there were only three paragraphs of section 28 (2), i.e. three sets of circumstances in which the tax advantage in consequence of the transactions in securities could be countered. A fourth was added as the Bill passed through the House of Commons. Section 39 (3) of the new Act now adds a fifth. Like the fourth, it is confined to companies of a special kind - if one can use this expression about the vast majority of the companies in Britain, all of which seem to be regarded by the Government as inveterate tax avoiders. These companies are those which are either under the control of not more than five persons or do not satisfy the condition that their equity capital is regularly dealt with on the Stock Exchange. We will call these 'special companies', and to avoid using the phrase 'person in question' as describing the target of a section 28 direction, we will use the expression 'the victim'. The new paragraph (e) of section 28 (2) can then be set out in tabulated form as follows:

- (i) the victim receives 'non-taxable consideration'; and
- (ii) the non-taxable consideration is (or represents the value of) assets available for distribution by a special company; and
- (iii) the non-taxable consideration consists of share capital or a security of a special company; and
- (iv) the victim receives it:
  - (a) in connection with the transfer (directly or indirectly) of assets of one special company to another special company; or
  - (b) in connection with any transaction in securities in which two or more special companies 'are concerned'.

It will be recalled that section 28 (2), into which the new paragraph (e) is now inserted, refers to 'profits' which it defines as 'including' such diverse things as 'income, reserves or other assets'. Lord DENNING has observed that this covers all assets, from which it follows that all a company's assets are profits. We need not therefore worry about the remarkable association of reserves with assets. The draftsman must have been thinking again about his definition of profits. He has not removed it from section 28 (2) but he has eschewed the use of it in the new paragraph (e). In place of it he now has 'assets available for distribution'. These he defines in section 39 (6) in two categories as follows:

- (i) assets which are (or apart from anything done by the company in question would have been) available for distribution by way of dividend; or
- (ii) trading stock.

'Non-taxable' consideration means that the person receiving does not pay or bear tax on it as income (ignoring in this connection section 28). Mr JOHN DIAMOND, the present Chief Secretary to the Treasury, used to say fervently in the debates on section 28 that if only we had a capital gains tax then sections like section 28 would be superfluous. We do have a capital gains tax now, and at a remarkably high rate, but none the less section 28 is not only retained but is extended. The fact that consideration will be charged to capital gains tax does not stop it (in the unreal realms of tax law) from being 'non-taxable'.

Section 28 (6) defines 'share' to include stock 'and any other interest of a member in a company'. The last phrase is a new ambiguity; what the draftsman presumably intended to mean was any interest which made the person having it a member. But it could equally mean that if a person is a member, then his interest as a member, and every other interest he may have in the company, is a 'share'.

'Security' is as defined in paragraph 7 (1) of Schedule 11 to the Finance Act 1965. When a paragraph contains phrases like 'in connection with' and 'concerned in', it becomes anybody's guess what is meant.

Whatever the scope of paragraph (e) may otherwise be, section 28 (4) puts a limit on it. So far as the paragraph relates to non-redeemable share capital, it is not to apply except to the extent that share capital is 'repaid' (which includes paying off in a winding-up). The section 28 assessment is to be for the year in which the capital is repaid.

Section 28 (5) allows a direction to be made on the estate of a deceased person; this cures an oversight in the original section. All the above changes are confined to transactions after May 2nd, 1966.

Giro scrutinized

THE glossy brochure issued last month by the post office and referred to in The Accountant of July 16th, has substantially increased public interest in the Giro due for launching in the autumn of 1968.

At one level, a correspondent in The Financial Times deplored the cost of the brochure (it has been sent to thousands of businesses and in due course is to be available from post offices to the general public) which he thought, a little extravagantly, must have exceeded the £500,000 said to have been spent on launching the Barclaycard. At another, the post office having asked for suggestions for improving the system, many of the brochure's readers – including no doubt a good proportion of accountants – have written to Mr Grady direct. Encouragingly, he seems to be ready to listen; it has now been accepted, for instance, that the debit transfer system, the Giro's principal innovation, will need careful watching to prevent fraudulent debiting and measures are to be taken to this end.

At yet another level, the banks are reported to be alarmed and the possibility of their starting their own giro system is being canvassed again. One may wonder whether the brochure, however glossy, or public reaction to it, however interested, is frightening the banks all that much. For the position is much the same as it has been from the start. If the coming of the Giro produces longer opening hours for the bank on the street corner, well and good; if the banks' funds available for lending are substantially reduced by the Giro's success, this kind of transfer of deposits from the banks' hands to the Government's will be a stiff price to pay for the privilege of cashing one's cheques at five o'clock.

There is room for improvement in banking services, though not as much as some of the banks' critics suggest; there is room for a Giro as well. Is it too much to hope for that we shall get the best of both worlds – an efficient Giro operating alongside a banking system that hasn't lowered its sights or its lending power?

Justified Optimism?

THE latest forecast of the economic situation to the end of 1967 prepared by the National Institute of Economic and Social Research has attracted considerable comment, not least because in comparison with the views of most commentators, it appears to be rather optimistic. In short, the Institute does not expect the present deflationary measures to bite very deeply. Output will not, it believes, fall but rather will continue to grow marginally at about 1 per cent per annum.

Furthermore, since the prospects for world trade remain good, British exports should continue their present rate of growth and, since imports will tend to contract as the freeze on prices and incomes takes its effect on consumer spending together with the slower rate of growth in industrial output, the U.K. balance of payments should by the end of 1967 be in surplus by as much as £250 to £300 million. And, throughout this period, the figure of registered unemployment seasonally adjusted is not expected to exceed 475,000.

Given sound reasons for expecting this out-turn, both the Government and industry should be able to view the immediate future with much more confidence. Any such revival in confidence which leads to higher industrial investment could make a world of difference, but what justification is there for it? Even assuming that the Institute's forecasts prove correct, all that has happened is that in exchange for the reversal of the external payments deficit, the nation has tolerated the minimum rate of growth. And even this will be achieved only if unemployment is allowed to rise to nearly half a million workers, if the prices and incomes standstill is effective and consumers do not start dis-saving.

It is all to the good that the Institute should lend its weight to correcting some of the more unduly pessimistic assessments of the economic prospect. It would be unfortunate, however, if the nation at large were to conclude that all that is needed to revive the British economy is a very modest dose of deflation and a temporary incomes freeze. Would that it were!

Taxes Galore

IN the course of the Committee stage of the Finance Bill the Chancellor of the Exchequer was at some pains to point out that the weight of United Kingdom taxation was much exaggerated by critics and that many countries charged their citizens more for the privilege of being governed. The current (August) Progress Report of the Department of Economic Affairs sets out some elementary facts on taxes. In Britain, taxes, local rates and National Insurance and health contributions are expected to yield £12,600 million in the current financial year. This total is equal to 32.5 per cent of the gross national product but, as the Report points out, this percentage is exceeded in France, West Germany, the Netherlands, Italy and Belgium. In all these countries it is noteworthy that the social security contributions provide a larger share of aggregate revenues than in Britain.

The most striking comparison made in the Report is given in a table setting out the growth of United Kingdom direct taxation. Between 1965–66 and 1966–67, the yield from taxes on income and capital is expected to rise from £4,612 million to £5,258 million, almost the entire increase being accounted for by the jump in aggregate company taxes. Thus, while income tax remains virtually static at £3,600 million in the current year and the charge from profits tax drops from £438 million to £95 million, the charge for corporation tax this year is estimated at £1,000 million. Just to underline the contribution that industry is making to finance the new Britain, almost the entire increased yield from indirect taxes, i.e. from £3,712 million to £4,073 million, is explained by the imposition of the selective employment tax.

The Ferranti Affair in Retrospect

AN article in the recently published Spring 1966 issue of the Journal of Accounting Research by Mr J. F. Flower, B.Sc.(ECON.), A.C.A., a lecturer at the London School of Economics, reviews dispassionately the available facts relating to the 'Ferranti affair' on the costing of a Government contract for the development and production of the Bloodhound missile, and the findings of the Lang Committee appointed in 1964 to investigate the matter. Mr Flower concludes that the Ferranti affair was in no sense either a scandal or a disaster. In fact the company had done its part very well indeed, having produced the Bloodhound at a cost and in time rather lower than the Ministry had expected. On the other side, it was true that some minor officials had made mistakes but it was, in the view of Mr Flower, the 'red-tape' rather than the mistakes in themselves which led to the confusion. In his opinion, had the case for the company been better argued in public and before the Lang Committee, the company would have attracted much less criticism and the consequences for its future profitability would have been less serious. According to Mr Flower the case provided a classic example of the deficiencies of the fixed-price form of Government contract, particularly where the overhead costs were so large – some 500 per cent – in relation to direct labour cost.

Many older members of the profession will be familiar with the writings of the late P. D. Leake, more especially his work on the theory of goodwill valuation. In the same issue of the Journal, Mr B. V. Carsberg, of the London School of Economics, seeks to evaluate Leake's contribution to this topic. After examining Leake's own writings and comparing them with those of his predecessors, such as Dicksee, Mr Carsberg concludes that Leake's ideas were hardly original. Nevertheless, they were a refinement and dissemination of existing thought on the subject.

Twenty-first Anniversary

CONGRATULATIONS to the Treasury's quarterly O. & M. Bulletin, one of the pioneer magazines in the organization and methods field, which this week celebrates twenty-one years of publication with its August issue.

The Bulletin first appeared in August 1945 when the Civil Service was already doing important work in O. & M. studies, and its reputation has grown as interest in the subject has increased. The anniversary issue includes several interesting articles on management techniques. One, on 'Cybernetic control and management', considers how cybernetics can help management. Another, 'Computer control of document distribution', is based on G.P.O. experience, but the lessons in it can be applied to any large organization with scattered offices, while a third analyses how a system of centralized dictation was established in a Government office. Two further articles deal with methods of work measurement.

The Bulletin is now sent to the Governments of twenty countries and circulates in many others. Forty-nine universities throughout the world also receive copies, as do fifty-two professional bodies in Britain. In addition to banks, building societies and insurance companies, more than one hundred and fifty major companies are also on the subscription list.

This is My Life

by An Industrious Accountant

THE representative of the big concern which has long been endeavouring to sell us a computer decided to soft-pedal theory for a while and to give instead a practical demonstration of the performance of his merchandise. Accordingly, he arranged for a group of us from our company's accounts department to do a tour of an installation model in a neighbouring manufacturing company. It was a most successful trip.

The real benefit, as the representative shrewdly surmised, was that he could take a back seat for a change and let our accountant hosts do the talking instead. After all, a satisfied customer gives the most valuable testimonial possible, and the users of the computer under review were profoundly satisfied with it. In fact, their casual attitude of routine efficiency was far more telling than his glowing tributes to ultra-modern scientific wonders. They put it firmly where it belonged, as just another tool of management, seemingly run by a group of composed girls with as little fuss as if it was a sewing machine.

Talking shop with our hosts over afternoon tea, however, they ventilated a problem to which they had not yet found an answer. It was so easy in theory, they said, for an expert programmer to perpetrate a fraud which would escape notice; how could suitable control be established so as to obviate, or at least to minimize, the risk?

The problem wasn't new. It originated when we commenced to post from original documents rather than from written journals; it grew when we translated the documents into punched cards and paper tape unintelligible to the uninitiated.

It raises its ugly head higher still when the evidence vanishes into the magic obscurity of drums and core-stores and memories. How does one check the accuracy of the input data?

The answer doesn't lie in a careful check of the program, nor yet in passing pre-arranged material through the processes and comparing the end-products with answers calculated in advance. These superficially impressive procedures may flatter but to deceive. Programs prepared by one may prove heavy weather for another to check; furthermore, a skilled operator can temporarily insert amendments or replace instructions. What if he built-in an instruction that the tots of all invoices for the account of so-and-so should automatically be increased by 50 per cent? Six months later it might be impossible to trace such an enormity in the masses of used tapes or abandoned storage, and even if discovered its author might never be traced. Unlike handwriting, an altered program is unidentifiable.

In early mechanized days we installed and verified to ensure the accuracy of the original punched holes, but a duplicated computer installation is scarcely feasible. Adequate control points and cross-checks by independent officials would be required. . . .

At this stage the senior programmer intervened with some asperity to ask if all accountants were born distrustful or were they warped in infancy - a query which introduced more heat than light into the discussion. Then a legalistic colleague interrupted to point out that in his opinion computers failed to comply with statutory regulations as to documents, records, evidence, and so on, being therefore invalid and ultra vires.

The representative almost choked in his efforts to make himself heard above the subsequent uproar, so we finished the visit with a mixture of thanks and wordy contradictions all the way down to the exit gate.

Ideal Accounting

by D. C. BEATON, C.A.

IF there existed an incontrovertible theory of accounting and theory was followed in practice, accounting would be easy. To establish an incontrovertible theory is not so difficult; the problem is putting theory into practice because of human limitations of factual knowledge and of prescience. Accountants naturally seek – particularly in the sphere of auditing – facts, certainty and objectivity; they abhor guesses, uncertainties and figures resulting from subjective judgments. Although it may not be found feasible to put accounting theory into practice, it is advisable always to have the theory in the back of one's mind when considering accounting problems; otherwise there is a danger of reaching unsound solutions.

It is worth while, therefore, trying to formulate a sound theory of accounting, and it assists doing so to make a mental assumption that all information is available, including knowledge of the future! Having formulated a theory on this inhuman assumption, one must then proceed to withdraw the assumption in order to test how practicable is the theory.

Most accounting problems emerge from the need to present financial results at yearly intervals; if a single account only were necessary covering the whole life of a business or company, problems would be few. Current accounting procedure tends to sublimate the profit and loss account. Sales are recorded and the cost of those sales is ascertained by what is sometimes called a matching process. The corollary of this procedure is that capital expenditure is regarded as deferred revenue expenditure ripe for division into yearly portions; and fixed assets appear in a balance sheet at cost less provision for depreciation, i.e. original cost minus so much as has so far been allocated yearly towards operating costs.

Different concept

In earlier times a different concept of profit or income was to the fore. The theory of it is derived somewhat as follows. If one looks into the future of a business one sees net receipts, or cash flows, coming in year by year, persisting during the life of the business until its final year of demise, or even persisting into the indefinite future. Since all that the business ever produces is comprised in these cash flows, it follows that the value of the business is the value of these cash flows. And since by reason of interest on capital, money accruing sooner is worth more in the present than money accruing later, the value of the business is the present value of the cash flows diminished progressively by discounting. If one knows the value of a business at the end of a year and the corresponding value at the beginning of the year, the profit or income of the year is the difference between the two, i.e. the excess of the value at the end over that at the beginning.

Although a business consists of an agglomeration of many assets, in valuing the whole business it is the value of all the assets welded into an economic unit that is significant rather than the sum total of the values of the individual assets as separate components; although the latter values are not without meaning. The values of individual assets are also required so as to demonstrate what it would cost to set up the business currently by acquiring the assets individually for that purpose.

Liquid assets and finished stock would be valued at market price, work in progress at current sales value of the finished product diminished by deductions measuring the degree of incompleteness, materials stock at replacement prices and fixed assets also at replacement prices after allowance for age. It is to be noted here that the valuation of stocks, finished and unfinished, at market value infers that profit is taken into account for the year on those stocks, in addition to profit on sales. This is logical in theory because profit properly attaches to productive activity as it occurs, rather than at the point of sale which may be haphazard or even infrequent, as in shipbuilding.

Intangible asset

An intangible asset which every dynamic business possesses, is its own live organization of human beings and of plant which they control and operate. To bring such an organization into existence costs money and its value is the difference between the value of the cash flows the existing organization will produce in the approaching years and the value of the cash flows – possibly some negative, i.e. losses – that would be produced during the same years if the business were now to be started up from scratch. At the point when the growing organization reaches the full stature of the going concern, then the cash flows it would produce would be as much as those of the existing going concern and there would be no differences to evaluate.

So far we have, on a balancing date, the value of a business as a whole and also the current values of the individual assets of which the business is composed. A comparison now is significant of the value as a whole with the aggregate of the individual values.

If the value as a whole exceeds the aggregate of the individual values, there is an indication that the business is competitive. The greater the excess, the greater is the success of the business in profitable terms and the greater would be the inducement for a rival to enter into competition. This excess would appear in the balance sheet described as a premium of some kind.

Not competitive

If, on the other hand, the value of the business as a whole was less than the aggregate of the values of the individual assets, that would indicate the business was not, entirely, competitive. No one could be expected to be willing to pay for the whole business as much as the aggregate of the individual values, when the value of the whole business was less than that aggregate. There would be a disincentive, prima facie, for a rival to enter into competition. In this instance, the shortfall would become a deduction from assets in the balance sheet and would be describable, to be consistent, as a form of discount.

If the value of the whole business were to fall materially below the aggregate of the individual values, then the market selling values of individual assets and their aggregate would become of significance. Normally when a going concern continues to be profitable, break-up values are not of interest. Where, however, there is a danger that the value of the business as a whole might fall below aggregate break-up values, such values need to be sought. Such a fall of value as a whole below break-up value would indicate the investment of the capital in the business was not profitable; the capital could profitably be withdrawn by winding up the business and be put into an alternative investment.

If the profit or income of a year of a business is arrived at in the first place in the way described above, i.e. by finding the excess of the closing value of the whole business over its opening value, the composition of the profit so arrived at would be somewhat as follows.

On the one hand, there would be the main credit for sales of the products of the business; there would be a further credit for any excess of the closing values of finished stock and work in progress over their opening values. The two credits together would represent the market value of the year's productive activity. Such productive activity would comprise the completion of unfinished work in progress at the start of the year, the output of units through the whole process of production within the time span of the year and the incomplete work in progress at the end of the year.

On the other hand, the main debits would be operating cost (excluding depreciation) representing current cost of the ingredients of the year's productive activity, and next a figure of changes in prices of materials and stores. This figure would comprise the differences between the values of the materials and stores in stock at the year-end, valued at current replacement prices, plus current values of materials and stores consumed during the year and the corresponding values either at the start of the year, or at the date of purchase during the year, as the case might be.

Also on the debit side of the profit and loss account for the year would be, besides taxation, the change in value of fixed assets over the year. This figure would be sub-divisible into fall in value through use, fall in value through obsolescence, and gain or fall in value attributable to change in price. The figures of fall in value through use and through obsolescence would be at current values, and the fall in value attributable to change in price would be the difference between closing fixed assets at current replacement prices plus the two figures of fall in value through use and obsolescence and the opening value of fixed assets at then replacement prices plus any additions during the year at cost.

Also in the profit and loss account would be two items, either debit or credit as circumstances dictated, namely, change in value over the year of the cost of bringing into existence the organization, i.e. goodwill, and change in what was described above as a kind of overall premium or discount, being the difference between the value of the business as a whole, based on expectations of future inflows, and the aggregate of the values of the component assets of the business.

To sum up, the aggregate of the above debits and credits in the profit and loss account would be expected to equal the figure of profit for the year arrived at by contrasting closing and opening values of the business as a whole.

Profit available for dividend

Since dividends are almost always paid in cash, it would be necessary to recognize that credits in the profit and loss account – which were not realizable in the short-term but in the long-term – could not be counted on as contributing to profit available for dividend.

However, to the extent that such a long-term credit was equalled by a loss of the same character which had been recognized in a previous year as restricting (to the extent of the loss) the profit available for dividend, then to that extent it would prima facie be unnecessary to make a current restriction on available profit, because the later credit would have the effect of releasing the earlier restriction.

Similarly, to the extent a long-term loss in the profit and loss account was equalled by a credit of the same character excluded from available profit in a previous year, then to that extent the current long-term loss would not require to be deducted in arriving at current available profit.

Whether a long-term loss, other than one such as described in the previous paragraph, was to restrict available profit could depend on whether the loss was permanent or temporary.

The Present Practice and Modern Developments in Auditing in the United States of America – II

by R. KIRK BATZER, A.B., M.S., C.P.A.

THE auditor's review of internal control, in so far as it relates to the accounting practices of the company, is best organized if it follows the organization of the company's accounting activities. In most commercial and industrial companies the accounting activity will be subdivided into sections responsible for receipt of cash, maintenance of accounts receivable, payrolls, cash disbursements, computation of sales, accounting for inventories, and maintenance of accounts payable. Internal control questionnaires will usually be subdivided into these categories and will have questions designed to elicit the required information. Obviously, in situations where the client's system is organized along different lines, the questionnaire is more effective if additional sections are prepared to coincide with the client's organization. Most questionnaires appearing in textbooks and reference books on auditing are designed for commercial and industrial companies. Obviously, important changes will be in order when the client is a bank, a railroad or an insurance company. The inclusion of a representative section of the questionnaire may help the reader in understanding this discussion. Since nearly all clients will have activities involving cash receipts, the questions and related discussion about this subject are included in the appendix. This material is derived from the questionnaire in use in my firm in the United States. Obviously, the questions are importantly influenced by commercial and banking practices there, and may not deal with all matters which are pertinent in the United Kingdom.

Administration of the review of internal control

29. From a review of the appendix, the reader will readily realize that these questions have been designed for use in the examination of the ordinary commercial or industrial client. In almost any company some of the questions will be inapplicable. In a paper of this length, it is obviously impossible to present in detail more than this one section of a questionnaire. From the presentation in the appendix, I trust the reader can project the form and content of a complete questionnaire covering all major aspects of his clients' accounting activity and financial statements.

30. Even a cursory review of this portion of the total will occasion a number of questions about the administration of this task to the mind of the practitioner who is asked to carry out this assignment. I shall endeavour to answer some of them.

31. Are the answers to be supplied by the auditor's staff or may they be filled in by the client? Generally speaking, our staff men make the investigation and fill in the answers. The auditor's obligation is to study and evaluate the system of internal control and this is his manner of so doing. Some of our clients will have accountants who have the training and competence to deal with this questionnaire and if this is the case, there is no reason why they should not be asked to complete it. This would be especially appropriate where there are many branches and divisions of an enterprise, of which the independent auditor may visit only a representative number. He may then request the client to have internal auditors or persons acting in such a capacity visit other branches, completing a questionnaire and carrying out an examination as requested by the independent auditor. However, there is no reason to avoid asking the client to perform this task merely because he does not have an internal auditor or an accountant in a staff capacity. I feel it is desirable for the client to take the time to perform this task himself as a useful self-examination, and I have urged clients to do so in spite of their pleas as to the other tasks assigned accountants. Whoever prepares the questionnaire, it is essential to remember that the independent auditor must have studied the system of internal control so that he can come to an informed opinion as to its effectiveness.

32. A second question might be – Is the questionnaire to be prepared in respect of all of the client's offices in which accounting functions are carried on? Generally speaking the answer is yes. Some companies may have uniform systems at all locations, closely controlled through specific instructions and periodic internal audits. More often, the reverse is the case; the independent auditor then has an obligation to evaluate the entire system, not merely the controls at the head office. However, in situations such as a bank with many branches, the independent auditor can usually justifiably rely on the situation reported by a competent internal examiner. If this is not so, the auditor has a most important comment he should communicate promptly to his client to the effect that such a system of reporting should be installed.

The second part of a paper presented at the Oxford Summer Course of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales.

One of the important decisions an auditor has to make is something like this – a review of internal controls at the several locations of a multi-plant company may indicate a situation where the auditor may justify limiting his more detailed examination to the larger locations, and not visit the smaller ones. Is he entitled to do so, since experience tells auditors generally that representations made in response to a questionnaire may not always be relied on? Needless to say, a decision of this question, in our firm, receives the most careful and mature consideration.

33. Another inquiry – Is the review to be made each year? The answer is yes. In our firm, it is a rule that the questionnaire will be completed on an initial examination; a review will be made of the system for each of the two succeeding years. If the controls have changed significantly, the appropriate section of the questionnaire is completed, and every third year the entire questionnaire is completed anew. On some engagements portions of the questionnaire are completed each year, so that the task is completed on the basis of rotation in three years.

The results derived from the review of internal control – the implementation of the audit programme

34. After having gone through this time-consuming but absolutely necessary exercise, in what position does the auditor find himself? He knows a great deal about his client. He is in the position of advising his client (which he should do) of possible significant weaknesses in internal control that the review may have brought out. He can plan and lay out his audit programme, judging the extent and timing of his detailed tests by the evidential matter his review has revealed.

35. At this stage of his examination, the auditor must deal with another standard of auditing, which I will repeat.

‘Sufficient competent evidential matter is to be obtained through inspection, observation, inquiries and confirmation to afford a reasonable basis for an opinion regarding the financial statements under examination.’

36. I am obliged to tell you that our Institute does not have much in our literature that would explain what is meant by ‘sufficient’ or ‘competent’. One year ago, the Committee on Auditing Procedure issued a statement dealing with long-term investments which defined and characterized certain types of evidential matter related to these assets.

37. In our practice, the auditor must make tests of underlying records and other evidential matter sufficient to ascertain that the related accounting practices are functioning as has been represented to him by his review of the system. The degree of testing that the auditor must do beyond this point will depend on the circumstances. Our view is that the auditor must do enough to arrive at an opinion that the financial statements are fairly stated. Additional work is not needed and, in our view, the client should not be asked to pay for it. The degree of testing will frequently vary inversely with the excellence of the internal control. However, an important aspect of the degree of internal control is the timing of the procedures, particularly as concerns items reflected in the balance sheet.

38. Under an excellent system of internal controls, presumably detailed tests of procedures or of items appearing in the statements could be made at any time, followed by a review of transactions between the date of such tests and the date of the financial statements. For example, we may find the internal controls with respect to items capitalized as part of property, plant, and equipment are of a high order. Likewise, our tests, which might be made covering a period selected by us and significantly earlier than the end of the company’s fiscal year, may bear out the good situation disclosed by the responses to the questionnaire. If other parts of audit engagement also disclose a similar high degree of control, I would see no reason why additional detailed tests need be made at the end of the period. Ordinarily, I would provide for a review to ascertain that there had been no significant deterioration in the controls or unusual changes in the account. If, on the other hand, the questionnaire and the detailed tests disclosed a less satisfactory situation, additional work at the year end would have to be considered. Normally, if the questionnaire indicated an unsatisfactory situation, I would have scheduled detailed tests to cover transactions and account balances at year end. As you may be aware, most publicly held companies in our country ask that the auditor’s report be available almost as soon as the statements are made up. Accordingly, it is most desirable for us to have as much audit work as possible completed before the year end date.

Responsibilities regarding defalcations and fraud

39. Developments and changes in auditing practice in recent years have substantially reduced the amount of detailed testing our staff perform. The old ‘holler and tick’ procedure has vanished. Most clients understand and appreciate the reasons for the change. Nevertheless, some clients and some auditors have been apprehensive. They fear that failure to make extensive mathematical tests of calculations signifies that an audit really has not been done, and that some honest error or even defalcation may elude detection that might otherwise be brought to light. The Committee on Auditing Procedure of the American Institute of Certified Public Accountants has stated the position of the profession in ‘Auditing Standards and Procedures’ as follows:

40. ‘In making the ordinary examination, the independent auditor is aware of the possibility that fraud may exist. Financial statements may be misstated as the result of defalcations and similar irregularities, or deliberate misrepresentation by management, or both. The auditor recognizes that fraud, if sufficiently material, may affect his opinion on the financial statements, and his examination, made in accordance with generally accepted auditing standards, gives consideration to this possibility. However, the ordinary examination directed to the expression of an opinion on financial statements is not primarily or specifically designed, and cannot be relied upon, to disclose defalcations and other similar irregularities, although their discovery may result. Similarly, although the discovery of deliberate misrepresentation by management is usually more closely associated with the objective of the ordinary examination, such examination cannot be relied upon to assure its discovery. The responsibility of the independent auditor for failure to detect fraud (which responsibility differs as to clients and others) arises only when such failure clearly results from failure to comply with generally accepted auditing standards.

41. ‘Reliance for the prevention and detection of fraud should be placed principally upon an adequate accounting system with appropriate internal control. The well-established practice of the independent auditor of evaluating the adequacy and effectiveness of the system of internal control by testing the accounting records and related data and by relying on such evaluation for the selection and timing of his other auditing procedures has generally proved sufficient for making an adequate examination. If an objective of an independent auditor's examination were the discovery of all fraud, he would have to extend his work to a point where its cost would be prohibitive. Even then he could not give assurance that all types of fraud had been detected, or that none existed, because items such as unrecorded transactions, forgeries, and collusive fraud would not necessarily be uncovered. Accordingly, it is generally recognized that good internal control and fidelity bonds provide protection more economically and effectively. In the case of fidelity bonds, protection is afforded not only by the indemnification for discovered defalcations but also by the possible deterrent effect upon employees; the presence of fidelity bonds, however, should not affect the scope of the auditor's examination.

42. 'When an independent auditor's examination leading to an opinion on financial statements discloses specific circumstances that make him suspect that fraud may exist, he should decide whether the fraud, if in fact it should exist, might be of such magnitude as to affect his opinion on the financial statements. If the independent auditor believes that fraud so material as to affect his opinion may have occurred, he should reach an understanding with the proper representative of the client as to whether the auditor or the client, subject to the auditor's review, is to make the investigation necessary to determine whether fraud has in fact occurred, and, if so, the amount thereof. If, on the other hand, the independent auditor concludes that any such fraud could not be so material as to affect his opinion, he should refer the matter to the proper representatives of the client with the recommendation that it be pursued to a conclusion. For example, frauds involving "lapping" accounts receivable collections, or frauds involving overstatements of inventory, could be material, while those involving peculations from a small imprest fund would normally be of little significance because the operation and size of the fund tends to establish a limitation.

43. 'The subsequent discovery that fraud existed during the period covered by the independent auditor's examination does not of itself indicate negligence on his part. He is not an insurer or guarantor; if his examination was made with due professional skill and care in accordance with generally accepted auditing standards, he has fulfilled all of the obligations implicit in his undertaking.'

44. This statement presumes that the examination is to be made in accordance with generally accepted auditing standards, and that the selection of tests and auditing procedures is made with the degree of skill commonly possessed by members of the profession. It is important to keep in mind that the auditor's primary responsibility is for a reasonable basis for his opinion on the financial statements under examination. His tests and auditing procedures are principally designed to assure him that generally accepted accounting principles have been consistently applied and that the account balances are combined to produce financial statements which are reasonably stated.

45. Such summarization of figures, especially those which usually appear on the statement of income, are often composed of numerous detail account balances. While the tests that the auditor may make are intended to afford reasonable assurance that the statement of income is fairly presented, they are not ordinarily designed to insure that the details making up the relatively few totals appearing therein are precisely classified or that all types of losses or expenses are separately disclosed. A company may suffer losses in many ways; management may be incompetent, sales policies may be ill-advised, costs may be higher than necessary, operating losses of various kinds may be suffered, and defalcations may be concealed through improper or unauthorized charges to cost or expense accounts. All such elements are reflected in the statement of income, but in order to state his opinion with respect to the operations of the year the auditor is not expected to segregate the various types of losses.

46. Auditing procedures followed by the public accountant are largely composed of tests, analyses, reconciliations, counts, and comparisons with independent sources of items appearing on the balance sheet. Accordingly, defalcations which are material and significant in the circumstances and which have not been concealed through charges to income are more likely to be disclosed through such procedures than those which have been concealed through improper charges to income. While the extent of tests should be dependent on the apparent quality of internal controls, nevertheless, under any dependence on tests and samplings, large areas of detailed transactions or balances will not be examined by the auditor. Errors may remain undetected; such errors may be innocent, or they may conceal a fraud.

47. However, an examination leading to an opinion on financial statements may disclose facts indicating the possibility of loss through defalcations and similar irregularities. The auditor should satisfy himself whether or not a potential loss is of such magnitude as to affect his opinion of the financial statements. He may well take into consideration the circumstances in which his suspicions were aroused. For example, peculations from an imprest fund would normally be expected to be of less consequence than those arising from 'lapping' accounts receivable collections. In any event, the client should be fully advised of the situation. If the auditor has established to his own satisfaction that a probable loss is not so material as to affect his opinion, the client should decide whether to pursue the matter further. When the auditor has reason to believe that a material loss from defalcations or similar irregularities exists, he has no alternative than to request that the amount be reasonably determined. The decision, whether the initial determination is to be made by the client or by the auditor as an additional assignment, would, of course, be made by the client. If the determination is made by the client, the auditor should satisfy himself of its reasonableness by appropriate tests.

48. The public accountant should endeavour to make sure, prior to starting an examination, that his client understands what he may expect from the type of examination to be made as to the discovery of defalcations and other similar irregularities. If such understanding is not reached, a client may take the position, after a defalcation not discovered by the auditor comes to light, that he expected the examination to include detailed audit procedures which should have detected the particular defalcation. It should be pointed out in advance that the extent of the tests to which auditing procedures are to be restricted will be determined by the auditor after proper study and evaluation of existing internal controls. A client with a reasonably good system of internal accounting control and internal check and an understanding that the usual examination for the purpose of expressing an opinion cannot be relied upon to disclose defalcations, particularly those concealed in the statement of income, usually does not wish to incur the expense of an examination beyond that necessary under generally accepted auditing standards to the formation of the auditor's opinion. Many auditors believe it prudent to confirm in writing their understandings with their clients concerning discovery of defalcations and similar irregularities.

49. Too frequently the auditor makes extended tests of cash transactions, vouchers, etc., because he is unwilling to discuss with the client the limitations of an examination, made for the purpose of expressing an opinion on the financial statements, as to detection of defalcations and other similar irregularities and hopes such extended tests may afford him some protection against unreasonable claims for undetected irregularities. My partners believe that such work is unjustified because it can neither be depended upon to disclose defalcations nor to protect the auditor from claims by the client. The proper course is to make sure the client understands the auditor's responsibilities in advance of undertaking the engagement.

50. It should not be understood from the above discussion that the independent auditor in making an examination leading to an expression of opinion upon financial statements is indifferent to the possibility that fraud exists. He always has in mind, in framing his audit programme and in reviewing the system of internal control, the possibility that the auditing procedures he follows to afford a reasonable basis for his opinion may detect fraud, if it exists at the time of his examination, and, more importantly, that they may deter fraud. These examinations over the years have uncovered many defalcations and peculations. There is no way of knowing how many potential cases of fraud have been prevented, either because of fear that fraud might be discovered by the auditor, or because the auditor has recommended procedures which made it difficult. The number must be large.

51. In order that our clients may have an understanding of this matter, our firm makes it a practice to set forth our views in writing. This communication sets forth the position that the purpose of our work is to express an opinion on the financial statements. It goes on to say forthrightly that the work is not designed to detect defalcations and other similar irregularities and is not to be relied upon to do so, even though their detection may often come to pass as a consequence. The letter will also say that our work will encompass a review of internal controls, the weakness in which will be reported to the client. The appropriate portion of such a letter might be phrased as follows:

52. 'Our examination of your annual financial statements will be made in accordance with generally accepted auditing standards and will include such tests of the accounting records and such other auditing procedures as we consider necessary in the circumstances. The objective of such an examination is the expression of our opinion on the fairness with which the statements present financial position and results of operations in conformity with generally accepted accounting principles consistently applied. In making our examination we will be aware of the possibility that fraud may exist, but it should be recognized that such an exami-

ation cannot be relied upon to assure the discovery of fraud, and that it is not primarily or specifically designed, and cannot be relied upon, to disclose defalcations and other similar irregularities, although their discovery may result. We shall, however, make careful reviews of your organization's system of internal control and, if necessary, shall inform you from time to time of weaknesses which we believe should be corrected and of our recommendations in this respect.'

53. While the issue of such a communication may very well be of assistance to us if we are brought to trial for failure to detect a fraud, its principal purpose is to remind management of our client that our function is to express an opinion on financial statements and that one of theirs is to maintain an adequate system of internal controls and safeguard the property of the company. On the other hand, such a letter is not intended to diminish in any way our professional responsibilities. We have an obligation to conduct an audit in a suitable manner, according to defined standards; if we fail to do so we must be prepared for the consequences. Whether a particular examination should have uncovered a particular situation is something that can be ascertained only in the light of all the accompanying circumstances.

Communication of suggestions to the client

54. In previous paragraphs I have referred to the desirability of having the auditor advise his client of weaknesses in internal control that he finds during his work. Many of these will come to light during the preparation of the questionnaire; perhaps the reader will have noticed that the questions dealing with cash receipts quoted from our questionnaires are so phrased that a 'yes' answer indicates a satisfactory condition and a 'no' answer indicates the reverse. Presumably the matters to which 'no' answers are made are candidates for inclusion in a report to the client. A written report is generally a preferred means of communication and can be cited readily if the question arises subsequently as to whether the comment was in fact communicated. Even in small companies, comments will be addressed to different levels of management. Some of them may appropriately be made to the chief book-keeper, others to the comptroller; some may be suitable only for the directors.

55. While the auditor's duty to report deficiencies to his client may be limited to those deficiencies having to do with financial and accounting matters, there is no reason why the auditor may not go further in advising his client. By reason of his extensive knowledge of his client's business and organization, the auditor is in a unique position. While his training and background present certain limitations as to his technical competence, his business experience will frequently qualify him as a valuable adviser on a wide range of subjects. In this respect, the auditor who hides his light under a bushel performs an ill service to himself and his profession. I prefer to believe that the usefulness of our profession can increase and it certainly will increase if we are willing to apply our extensive knowledge in making recommendations designed to improve and increase the profitability of our client's business. In our own firm our managing partner has made the following statement:

56. 'It shall be our policy henceforth to furnish as part of our regular service to as many audit clients as possible, periodic reports to management analysing recent operations and results, and containing comments and recommendations designed to aid and improve the client's operations, productivity and profitability, and its relative position in the industry. The scope of these reports will not be limited to recommendations for improvements in accounting procedures and internal control, but will contain analyses, comments and recommendations concerning any phase of the company's organization, its operations and its economics.'

57. In many cases, it is feasible to organize this effort in a way that the steps undertaken may supplement audit procedures. In other cases, as the auditor gains experience and self-confidence, he may well go beyond areas he would normally investigate and apply his experience in studying and evaluating administrative procedures and controls in other areas - purchasing, production planning and budgeting. The potential in this area of service is great. Industry has a real need for this service. I believe the experienced auditor is well qualified to perform this service.

APPENDIX

Questionnaire for review of internal control section dealing with cash receipts

Cash is usually received by mail, or over the counter such as in retail establishments, or by outside salesmen or route men. As to receipts by mail,

- (a) Is a detailed listing made showing names and amounts? Obviously, this record may be in many different forms. For example, it may be in the form of entries in a cash-book, the original or copy of a written tabulation, adding machine tapes, bank deposit slips, copies of remittance advices, or groups of collection stubs. When the volume of mail collection is large, many companies use an adding machine tape as a control mechanism for amounts, and prepare or use one of the following as a posting medium:
  - (1) Remittance advices, which may be prepared on receipt of the payment or may represent a section of the original invoice torn off and sent with the payment by the customer.
  - (2) Copy of the bank deposit slips with details of sources added. In these circumstances, the posting medium serves as the detailed listing of the names.
- (b) Are individual items of cash receipts totalled daily or at other suitable intervals?
- (c) Do such totals serve as controls over bank deposits, entries in the cash-book and contra credits?
- (d) (1) Are post-dated cheques and disputed items included in the list referred to in (a)?
  - (2) If not, is control over these items established by separate listing, physical segregation or other means?
- (e) Is the total of the listing in the cash-book compared with (1) the deposit slip total? (2) credits to accounts receivable control or other control accounts?
- (f) When a list other than that in the cash-book is prepared, is the total of such list compared with the cash-book total?

The auditor obtains assurance of the effectiveness of internal control over total cash receipts when the comparisons described in (e) and (f) are made. Correctness of detailed postings, especially to individual customers' accounts, would be assured by comparison of the detailed listing referred to in (a) with detailed accounts receivable postings. In actual practice, this is seldom done. Frequently the accuracy of the accounts receivable posting medium is assured by simultaneous mechanical preparation of the detailed list and the posting medium. Detection of errors in posting from such lists usually depends upon customers' complaints resulting from monthly statements or from circularization.

- (g) Do the duties of the persons who prepare the detailed listing of receipts by mail exclude the functions of:
  - (1) Preparing the bank deposit?
  - (2) Posting customers' remittances to detailed accounts receivable?
  - (3) Posting credits for cash received to general ledger accounts?
  - (4) Entering amounts in the cash receipt book?

The independent listing of receipts minimizes the possibility of omissions from deposits and recorded receipts as well as concealment of these omissions by erroneous postings of credits. It is obviously important that no person having duties described above has access to these receipts before the listing is made.

- (h) Are cash receipt items withheld from deposit:
  - (1) Reviewed by a responsible person independent of cash receipts or accounts receivable functions?
  - (2) Released by a responsible independent person for return to payer, or for deposit?
- (i) Are cash receipt items, withheld from deposit but not listed or otherwise under accounting control, held by a responsible person independent of:
  - (1) The person preparing the deposit?
  - (2) Those responsible for posting detailed accounts receivable or other contra accounts?

In the absence of accounting control, responsible independent physical segregation may safeguard these items.

As to cash receipts over the counter or through collectors:

- (a) If cash registers are used:
  - (1) Do they prepare tapes?
  - (2) Are the tapes retained?
  - (3) Are the totals of the tapes reconciled with the cash collected at least once a day?
  - (4) If the answer to (1) is 'No', is the cash register cumulative total reconciled periodically with recorded receipts?
- (b) If counter sales slips, cashiers' receipts or collectors' receipts are used:
  - (1) Are retained copies pre-numbered?

- (2) Are numbers accounted for?
- (3) Are totals of the slips or receipts reconciled periodically with the cash collected?
- (c) Are totals shown by the cash registers (tapes or readings), or totals of sales slips or receipts:
  - (1) Summarized for recording each day?
  - (2) Compared with:
    - Cash-book totals?
    - Deposit slip totals?
    - Credits to contra control accounts?
- (d) Are the duties of the persons who receive cash over the counter or through collectors independent of:
  - (1) Other cash functions?
  - (2) Custody of other negotiable assets?
  - (3) Posting detailed accounts receivable?
  - (4) Posting general ledger accounts?

The segregation of duties indicated above curtails the opportunity to conceal irregularities without collusion. When some of the duties are assigned to one department, proper segregation of the duties within that department is important; satisfactory internal control may be provided by other procedures, such as a check of these receipts and the accounting for them by someone other than the person receiving them.

As to cash receipts by outside salesmen or route men:

- (a) Are salesmen charged for the merchandise furnished to them for sale?
This charge may be in terms of money or in units of merchandise; it establishes control over subsequent transactions.
- (b) Are salesmen required to turn over cash and to report transactions (such as sales and charges to customers) at regular fixed intervals?
- (c) Are cash receipts and charges to customers reconciled at least once a month with changes in inventories charged to salesmen?
- (d) Are items of merchandise held by the salesmen physically inventoried at the time these reconciliations are made?
- (e) Are the aggregates of collection items (cash receipts and charge sales) compared with:
  - (1) Cash-book totals?
  - (2) Deposit slip totals?
  - (3) Debits and credits to accounts receivable control or other control accounts?
- (f) Does someone independent of the salesmen or route men:
  - (1) Check the merchandise at the time it is furnished to them?
  - (2) Take or check the inventory which supports their reports?
  - (3) Check the accounting for collection items?

- (4) Reconcile the reports with related book entries?

As to all forms of cash receipts:

- (a) Are each day's receipts recorded promptly when received?
- (b) Are cash receipts at branch offices reported promptly to the main office?
- (c) Do the reports on which cash receipts are summarized provide for the inclusion of all known sources of cash receipts?

When cash receipts information comes from many sources, such as a number of departments, cash registers, route books, vending machines and branch offices, practices should be followed which account for all collection points.

- (d) Are each day's receipts, exclusive of post-dated items, deposited intact and promptly?
- (e) Are receipts by a branch office deposited locally subject only to main office withdrawal?
- (f) Are cheques charged back by banks: received by a person independent of those:
  - (1) Preparing the deposit?
  - (2) Posting detailed accounts receivable?

- (g) Does a person independent of those preparing bank deposits, entering amounts in cash receipts book, posting customers' remittances and posting credits for cash received to general ledger accounts:

- (1) Obtain directly from banks authenticated duplicate deposit slips for all deposits?
- (2) Compare authenticated deposit slips in detail with cash-book entries?
- (3) Compare amounts on authenticated deposit slips in detail with the original listing and reconcile the totals?
- (4) Compare authenticated deposit slips with bank statement entries?

These procedures provide a control over checks and other items withheld from immediate deposit and disclose items not recorded in both bank statements and the books.

- (h) Have all banks been instructed:
  - (1) Not to cash cheques or money orders payable to the client?
  - (2) Not to accept for deposit in special accounts (such as payroll or petty cash accounts) cheques of others payable to the client?
- (i) Are totals of cash receipts compared with cash-book and deposit slip totals, and with credits to accounts receivable control and other control accounts by persons independent of:
  - (1) Cash receipts functions?
  - (2) Accounts receivable functions?
  - (3) Posting credits for cash received to the general ledger?
- (j) Are the totals of the above listing verified?

The footing of the cash column may be checked by the person making the independent bank reconciliation.

NEW ZEALAND

Taxation Review Committee Appointed

THE names of members of a special committee to carry out a review of central taxation in New Zealand were announced recently by the Minister of Finance, Mr H. R. Lake.

The terms of reference of the committee include carrying out a review of rates, structure and incidence of the whole field of central Government taxation in New Zealand, both direct and indirect, and to report on any changes in taxation law or practice which appear to be desirable. This broad reference is somewhat limited by the qualification that they should have regard to the need to maintain an adequate level of total taxation revenue in relation to Government expenditure, and to the requirements of economic growth and stability.

Accountants are well represented on the committee. The chairman will be Mr L. N. Ross, F.P.A.N.Z., a member of the Council of the New Zealand Society of Accountants, who was chairman of the committee appointed by Government in 1963 to report on the operation of the P.A.Y.E. taxation system. Other members of the Society are Messrs N. B. Fippard, M.B.E., F.P.A.N.Z. and R. G. Stark, M.B.E., F.P.A.N.Z., who are both Past Presidents of the Society, and Professor E. Stamp, C.A., A.R.A.N.Z., Professor of Accountancy at Victoria University of Wellington and a member of the Society's Board of Research and Publications.

Other members of the committee are Dr C. A. Blyth, formerly director of the New Zealand Institute of Economic Research, and now on the staff of the Australian National University in Canberra and Mr L. M. Papps, a Wellington solicitor.

The committee will be assisted by a full-time secretariat of officers seconded from the Department of Inland Revenue, Customs and Treasury. Consideration will also be given to engaging one or more experts from overseas to act as consultants.

UNITED STATES

Pension Funds and the Stock-market

FEDERAL Reserve statistics show, states Mr Carol J. Loomis, in the June issue of Fortune, that in 1965 private non-insured pension funds were still the biggest net buyers of common stocks, spectacularly dominating the market. A Fortune survey shows that the banks envisage a long-range considerable increase in the proportion of common stocks to total assets for corporate pension funds. Five banks specifically mentioned 70 per cent or above as desirable long-range objectives. Mr Loomis contrasts this with the position of two years ago when it was widely believed that such ratios, based on market value, would stabilize at about 50 per cent, which would be about 40 per cent at book value.

This interest of banks in common stocks contrasts with their comparative lack of interest in the course of interest rates, high as they are. Mr Loomis says they have been impressed by the results of studies such as that made at the Centre for Research in Security Prices at the University of Chicago which revealed a 9.8 per cent median rate of return for all New York Stock Exchange stocks in the 1926-60 period, compounded annually with assumed reinvestment of all dividends. The banks are responding to the increasing concern of corporations about the cost of financing their pension plans and the consequent increased emphasis on portfolio performance.

Mr Loomis comments that not all corporate pension funds have joined the trend. General Motors still limits the common stock percentage to 50 per cent of book value, the policy with which it began its pension fund in 1950. Most conservative of all is Anglo Telegraph and Telephone which restricts its common stock holdings to 20 per cent of book value.

Message to Management

IN a message to management, published in the American Management Association's Management Review for June, Mr Lyndon B. Johnson, President of the United States, warns that technology has become a master demanding efficiency and co-operation. In today's United States economy, the last five years have seen an increase of over seven million to a total of 73½ million workers in civilian jobs, with an unemployment rate lower than for more than twelve years. Retail sales are 9 per cent greater than a year ago. The average manufacturing worker earns over $110 a week, while corporate profits provide the highest sustained after-tax return on owners' capital in the whole period of recorded data.

The President urges that the greatest challenge lies ahead. The nation lies at the crossroads, one road leading to inflation and uncertainty, the other to prosperity and growth. Employees are being urged to invest in the Government Employees Savings Programme and the Government is postponing capital construction as much as is consistent with defence needs. Nevertheless the lion's share of the task of keeping the economy healthy rests on the leaders of business and finance. Every business man with price or wage decisions to make must remember that, in the longer run, they will affect the national interests.

The Story of a Professional Accounting Firm

A LONG article in Fortune (July 1st) must be unique in revealing to the world the widespread activities of a great international professional accounting firm. It tells the story of Messrs Peat, Marwick, Mitchell & Co, referring to the 'tight-lipped company policy and the auditing profession's ethical canons which frown on publicity' as having led, until recently, to the 'discreet anonymity' about the firm's operations. The author, Mr T. A. Wise, attributes the change to a series of spectacular law suits. There is no suggestion, he says, that the auditing firms or their partners profited, and it is obvious that the plaintiffs hope to recover from the insurers, under the large liability policies carried by the auditors.

On the subject of major suits now pending, Mr Wise asks how much the auditor should disclose to third parties as to the financial situation of a particular client. The banks, in retaining the same auditor to study a firm's finances seem, he says, to be pressing the auditor to inform them if he thinks the borrower's financial condition is unsound. The auditor is resisting firmly on the grounds of privileged client relationship. What, asks Mr Wise, if the auditing firm also supplies the management consultants who investigate the 'privileged client'? He concludes with a reference to the auditor's key responsibility for checking the computers to see that they are programmed accurately and to guard against fraud. He says that Peat, Marwick have acquired a General Electric 115 machine solely to train its men in auditing the computer.

CANADA

New Ontario Bill and Disclosure Requirements

THE Ontario Corporations Act Amendment Bill not only requires corporate annual reports on a comparative basis, including the amount of sales or gross revenue, but also a statement of source and application of funds, except in certain circumstances. Publication of such a statement is recommended by the Canadian Institute's Bulletin No. 20 but is still not required by the Canada Corporations Act 1965. The Ontario Bill also requires interim unaudited financial statements to be published every six months.

Companies not incorporated under the Ontario Act but with shares listed on the Toronto Stock Exchange will be required to file material with the Ontario Securities Commission, where it will be available to the public. The Ontario Securities Act of 1966, proposed by a Bill before the Ontario Legislature, provides for a Financial Disclosure Advisory Board of not more than five members. The new legislation covers five major areas - financial disclosure, prospectuses, insider trading, take-over bids and proxy solicitation. It will bring Ontario practice more in line with that in the United States.

Current Law

Contract for Sale of Land Unenforceable

IN George Wimpey & Co Ltd v. Sohn and Another ([1966] 1 All E.R. 232) the plaintiff company had entered into a written contract to buy, with a view to development, an hotel property which included a strip of garden land, essential to the proposed development, over which the defendants had garden rights, but to which they had no documentary title. Accordingly they agreed to convey all such right title and interest as they had, and to support their title with a statutory declaration to the effect that the property had been in the undisputed possession of the defendants and their predecessors for twenty years and upwards. In fact the defendants were unable to show undisputed possession for a twenty-year period, but they alleged that they had been in adverse possession for twelve years, and they sought to force on the plaintiff a possessory title based on sections 4 (3) and 10 of the Limitation Act 1939.

The Court of Appeal held, however, that the defendants, having contracted expressly to support their possessory title by evidence showing twenty years of undisputed possession, and having failed to do so, could not fall back on twelve years of undisputed possession: a vendor who offered only such right as he had must abide by a condition which obliged him to support it in a certain way, and could not affect to perform his contract by an assertion of a different right and the production of different evidence. Quite apart from this, their lordships found on the facts that the defendants had not shown a title to the land for twelve years by adverse possession: although the land had been fenced, this did not amount to an act of exclusion of the owner and the evidence did not establish an intention to exclude him.

Inefficiency, Carelessness and Unwise Conduct not Oppression

THE petitioner in Re Five Minute Car Wash Service, Ltd ([1966], 1 All E.R. 242) sought relief under section 210 of the Companies Act 1948, asking that E., G. Ltd and H. Ltd, who between them held the controlling shareholding in the company, be ordered to purchase his shares at £100 per share, or that such other order might be made in the premises as should be just.

Considering what must be proved by a shareholder seeking relief under section 210, Buckley, J., said that the mere fact that a member had lost confidence in the manner in which the company's affairs were conducted did not lead to the conclusion that he was oppressed; nor could resentment at being outvoted; nor mere dissatisfaction with or disapproval of the conduct of the company's affairs, whether on grounds relating to policy or to efficiency, however well founded. Those who were alleged to have acted oppressively must be shown to have acted at least unfairly towards those who claimed to have been oppressed.

In the present case the allegations made by the petitioner suggested that E. was unwise, inefficient and careless in the performance of his duties as managing director and chairman of the board of the company, but Buckley, J., could find in them no suggestion that he had acted unscrupulously, unfairly, or with any lack of probity towards the petitioner or any other member of the company, or that he had overborne or disregarded the wishes of the board, or that his conduct could be characterized as harsh or burdensome or wrongful towards any member. The complaint against G. Ltd and H. Ltd, was that they had failed to use their voting control to curtail E.'s actions and, by reason of such failure, had permitted and condoned his alleged oppressive conduct of the company's affairs, but the conduct of E. not having been shown to be oppressive the complaint against G. Ltd, and H. Ltd, necessarily fell to the ground. An act of omission such as was alleged against them might, Buckley, J., said, perhaps in some circumstances be held to amount to oppressive conduct, but it seemed to his lordship that it would be necessary to allege and establish that it was designed to achieve some unfair advantage over those claiming to be oppressed before mere omission could be held to be oppressive, and no such allegation was made in the present case. The petition showing no ground for relief, it was dismissed.

Court's Power to Pass Over Executors

THE testator in In the Estate of Biggs ([1966], 1 All E.R. 358) appointed as his executors Mr and Mrs G. It was a small estate and Mr G. carried out in good faith the terms of the will, but he took no steps to obtain probate. The testator was predeceased by his sister, L., who died intestate, leaving the testator and P. as the only persons entitled to her estate. Letters of administration to L.'s estate were granted to P., and it became necessary for probate of the testator's estate to be obtained in order that P. might obtain a lawful receipt for the moneys which passed to it from L.'s estate.

P.'s advisers took the view that as Mr G. had intermeddled with the estate he could not lawfully renounce his executorship, and efforts were made to persuade him to obtain a grant of probate. As he refused to do so, P. issued a citation under Rule 46 (3) of the Non-Contentious Probate Rules 1954, and then, as Mr G. did not appear to the citation, an order under Rule 46 (5) (c) for an order that he should apply for and obtain a grant within fourteen days of service of the order. There was evidence that Mr G. was elderly, unwell, and apparently unfitted by any experience to carry out the duties of an executor, and also that he was violently aggrieved by being called upon to do so, and that Mrs G. took the same attitude. P. then issued a summons for an order discharging the order calling on Mr G. to take out a grant of probate, and asking for an order passing over Mr G.'s interest and directing a grant of letters of administration to the applicant.

Rees, J., held that the Court had a wide power under section 162 (1) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act 1925, as amended by section 9 of the Administration of Justice Act 1928, to pass over Mr G., in spite of the fact that he had intermeddled, and to declare that his interest in the executorship had wholly ceased. At the same time his lordship passed over Mrs G., although she had not applied in terms to renounce and had not, save by her conduct, actually renounced, and he made a grant of administration with the will annexed to P.

Inexpensive Calculator

THE Nippon Master desk calculator is the latest desk calculating machine to be imported by Broughtons of Bristol. The machine has a working capacity of 10 × 11 × 21 and measures 14 by 5 $\frac{1}{2}$  by 7 in. The casing is manufactured of high-impact grey resin providing increased protection against accidental damage, and the numerals are guarded by a clear Perspex shield.

Nippon Master Desk Calculator

The calculator has automatic reversing mechanism for the quotient register and a red signal appears when dividing. The simple register clearances are effected by the use of logically placed levers on the carriage and specially designed decimal pointers facilitate the placing of decimal positions.

Versatile Intercom

AS well as full intercommunication for up to nineteen points, the M.R. intercom system has staff location and public address facilities (normally found only in very costly installations) as built-in features.

Normally one station has this facility – usually the telephone operator (though this can be extended to any master if desirable). By pressing the all-call button, all instruments in the system are instantly connected. A message or paging from the particular instrument will then be heard by all other stations. Store rooms and corridors can be covered by the use of paging speakers.

The system consists of three kinds of master – four-, nine-, and eighteen-station. These can be linked in any desired combination, together with the normal range of Centrum substations, speakers and weatherproof loud-hailers for outdoor sites, to provide a tailor-made system for individual needs. Thus, if a small firm needs a four-station system only, MR4 masters are used. Yet the system may be extended at any time by the addition of MR9 or MR18 masters up to a total of nineteen stations.

Again, if certain localities, e.g. workshops, require limited call facilities only, they can be equipped with the workshop substation, which can call one master only, or the MR4, which can call up to four stations, and so on.

Computer System for Production Control

BROOM & WADE LTD, have installed an I-C-T 1902 central processing computer incorporating a card reader, card punch, line printer and four magnetic tape units to perform the routine work associated with production control and to indicate the situations requiring action.

A further aspect of the new system is that, ultimately, it will quickly pinpoint any variations in sales demands, thereby enabling management to adjust production programmes to meet the new sales trends earlier than is at present possible.

The computer team has been built up around existing staff who have been given extensive training by I-C-T. In addition, a number of senior managers have attended courses and a series of appreciation lectures has been given to both office and factory staff.

Portable Strip Index

THERE is a growing realization of the merits of what is generally called the strip index system. Basically the idea consists of card strips so mounted in panels that new strips can be introduced or old ones removed without spoiling the sequence of the whole index. No re-writing of the main index is involved and only live, current strips are retained.

A new product by Kalamazoo, the Strip Index Folder, caters for the smallest number of records. It is additional to the existing Kalamazoo range of book, rotary and wall indexes and its features are:

- (1) four or six plastic panels welded together, folding to a size of 13 by 8 in.;
- (2) the folder opens and closes easily and can be carried in a brief-case or under the arm;
- (3) maximum capacities are: 224 or 336 for the four- or six-panel folders;
- (4) the strips are 6 $\frac{3}{8}$  in. wide, in five colours and depths, and may be plain or printed.

Computing Service Expansion

THE computing service offered by International Computers and Tabulators Ltd has recently been increased by the installation of an I-C-T 1905 computer at the London Computing Service Centre and an I-C-T 1903 at the Manchester Computing Service Centre.

It is planned to install a 1903 at the Birmingham Centre to augment the existing 1301, and to establish a core-store to core-store link between the newly installed 1905 and the existing I-C-T Orion in London. A data link from the London Centre to the Manchester Atlas already exists.

I-C-T's computing service facilities are used for a very wide range of applications by some six hundred customers each year. The biggest demand is for general commercial and industrial applications such as sales analysis, stock control and cost analysis, and special programs have been developed for such tasks as share registration and examination-board work.

Cost Control by Computer

A HONEYWELL 120 (Series 200) computer came into operation last month at the Nottingham head office of Jersey-Kapwood Ltd, manufacturers of fabrics, lace and lingerie, as part of the company's growth plans.

Over the ten months prior to the installation of the computer, the company formed its own team of programmers and analysts (training some who had had no previous knowledge or experience), and wrote and tested many programs.

One of the computer's first tasks is to produce a complete suite of costing programs which will enable the company to assess very rapidly the effect on costs and profits of such things as yarn price fluctuations, labour cost increases, and so on. The full effect of an alteration to a yarn price, which previously took some weeks to work out, will in future be known within a few hours.

The computer will provide a daily information service to assist in management accounting and this will be part of an integrated data processing system covering inventory control, production planning and, eventually, the company's budgetary control and forecasting methods. Ultimately Jersey-Kapwood plan to expand the system to incorporate data communications between head office and outlying factories, so that customer requirements are serviced with maximum efficiency.

New Dictation Telephone

A NEW kind of telephone for use with the Aga Teledictation system has been introduced by the Aga Dictating Machine Co Ltd. The telephone is for use with the separately wired version of Teledictation. It incorporates improved circuitry to provide a high standard of sound reproduction and is smaller and more compact than previous telephone designs. Two examples are available, one being dial-equipped for Linefinder systems. The latter automatically 'finds' a free Agavox dictating machine on the remote-control bank. The second example has push buttons and manual selection of the remote control Agavox.

These new telephone designs further enhance the versatile Teledictation system. Other recent developments of the separately-wired system include plug-in telephones for flexibility and 'paired' telephones to reduce wiring costs.

Barclaycard Equipment

EQUIPMENT supplied by Addressograph-Multigraph Ltd is being used in the running of the Barclaycard scheme of Barclays Bank. The Addressograph model 12/48/6 data recorder, field-tested in America over several years, has been selected for issue to traders, stores, hotels, travel agencies, garages, etc., who are participating in the scheme. Furthermore, four model 6800 A-M Graphotype machines are used for producing automatically the plastic credit cards from Barclays' own punched customer cards, plus two further keyboard operated Graphotypes for store or merchant plates. A holder submits his card, instead of paying cash immediately, and this is used to print his account number, name and code on an invoice. The invoice is then submitted by the hotel, store, etc., to Barclays for settlement; credit card holders are required to settle their accounts within twenty-five days of account being rendered; failing this a charge of 1 $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent a month is made on the balance unpaid.

International Computer Congress in Edinburgh

APPROXIMATELY two hundred and fifty technical papers covering all aspects of data processing from 'the state of the art' to future developments envisaged in the information processing sciences will be given by speakers from many countries at the next congress of the International Federation for Information Processing (IFIP) to be held in Edinburgh, from August 5th to 10th, 1968.

More than four thousand computer experts from forty countries are expected to attend the congress of which H.M. the Queen has agreed to be Patron. The subjects under discussion will be broadly divided into mathematics, computer 'languages', computer equipment, scientific applications, education and business.

Every three years the IFIP sponsors a world congress in one of its member countries. Prior to the formation of the IFIP an inaugural conference was held under the sponsorship of UNESCO in Paris in 1959. Subsequent congresses took place in Munich in 1962 and New York in 1965. The 1968 congress is being organized by a committee formed by the British Computer Society and representing a wide cross-section of professional societies and people concerned with computers and data processing including members from the British Computer Society, the Scottish Office, the Ministry of Technology and those professional bodies who are represented on the United Kingdom Automation Council.

Concurrently with the congress an exhibition will be held at Edinburgh's Waverley Market. An exhibition area of some 30,000 sq. ft will be available for one of the most comprehensive displays of computers, computing equipment and all allied services.

Special Designs on Letratapes

AVAILABLE from Letraset Ltd is a service which, from £3 to £7 a tape depending on width, enables a firm's own designs to be reproduced en masse. Trade-marks, logos and special technical symbols can be covered by the service. The tape reels are from 0.5 to 2 in. wide for symbols from 0.2 to 1.7 in; the symbol colour is black only and the adhesive used is dyeline heat resistant.

The designs are printed on a 66 ft reel and this comes packaged in a dispenser which automatically separates the protective backing paper and presents the designs ready for transfer to artwork or other reproduction masters. Full details are given in a brochure available from the company.

Finance and Commerce

Belliss & Morcom

THIS year there has been an entire – and necessary – reorganization of the accounts of Belliss & Morcom Ltd, manufacturers of steam turbines and compressors. From the point of view of presentation the 1964-65 accounts were not exactly brilliant. Combined parent and consolidated balance sheets, with comparisons, were given to a single narrative and the whole was spread over a double quarto opening. It was an eye-ranging exercise and the layout was fussy.

This year the style, printing and layout are vastly improved and credit should be given to Rodway Drew and Hopwood Ltd, the designers and printers. As the reprint shows, columnar form has been adopted but, with the best will in the world, our reprint cannot indicate the clarity and style of the original.

By coincidence, the Bellis & Morcom accounts provide another example of the inclusion of bank overdrafts in funds employed – the case of De La Rue was noted last week. Bellis & Morcom, with no beating about bushes, simply state the item as 'Borrowed Money' and, as Note 5 shows, lump acceptance credits and bank overdraft together for the purpose. In the 1964-65 accounts, 'Bank Loans and Overdraft' was a current liabilities item.

Latest practices

The increase in 'Borrowed Money' and the need to finance higher turnover and stocks recently led to the issue of £400,000 of 7½ per cent 1986-91 debenture stock. But referring back to the 'Borrowed Money' item itself, it is interesting to note that Mr R. F. Batty, the chairman, says that the format of the accounts has been changed partly to deal with the formal incorporation, early in October 1965, of Bellis & Morcom Manufacturing Ltd as a wholly owned subsidiary of Bellis & Morcom Ltd, and 'partly to keep abreast with the latest practices in the presentation of accounts'. The siting of 'Borrowed Money' in 'Sources of Funds' is becoming latest practice.

Another point worth noting is that the directors of the company are engineers to a man and it is interesting that a board of directors, entirely composed of engineers, should have led the company to such a complete change to the modern idiom in account presentation. Their professional concern with accuracy and precision probably has much to do with it – and so, probably, have suggestions from others in the organization, not at boardroom level, and with different qualifications.

But concern with accuracy and precision is reflected in Mr Batty's clipped and almost clinical statement with the accounts.

Productivity and earnings

Referring shareholders to the 'Direct Labour Productivity and Earnings' details – included in the reprint – Mr Batty comments 'The Icknield Square (the Bellis & Morcom works) direct labour productivity increased by about 11 per cent. Allowing for some increases in prices which were equivalent to about 2 per cent of this increase a real increase in productivity of about 9 per cent was obtained.'

'There was an increase of some 4.3 per cent in direct labour earnings. The reasons for the increase in productivity during the year stem largely from the degree of rationalization which has made possible the expansion of the air and gas compressor business, the application of value analysis by the purchasing and design departments together with the employment of new machine tools.'

'At Gloucester, W. Sisson & Company were able to achieve an increase in direct labour productivity of 14 per cent compared with a reduction of 6.4 per cent in 1964-65 and direct labour earnings increased by some 7.5 per cent during the year. Over the last three years direct labour earnings at Gloucester have increased faster than direct labour productivity.'

Admission

AN interim report from Albion Ltd, clothing manufacturers, giving results for the half-year to March 31st, 1966, was issued with the bland statement that 'comparative figures for the half-year to March 31st, 1965, are not available as interim accounts were not prepared last year.' The directors are to be congratulated on admitting that state of affairs but it is a peculiar admission none the less. Maybe there was not, in 1965, the same drawing up of figures as presented to shareholders this year – pre-tax profit, estimated tax, net profit and outside shareholders' interest in subsidiaries – but surely, at March 31st, 1965, the directors knew how earnings were going?

They must have done, and, even if actual interim accounts were not prepared, there surely was a figure for the six months to March 1965, which could have been set alongside the pre-tax profit of £141,000 shown for the six months to last March. Pre-tax profit for the full year to last September 30th was £271,923 and, all being well, current year profits, shareholders are told, should not be less than that.

CITY NOTES

ALTHOUGH the London Stock Exchange continues to see technical rallies from time to time, real recovery is not looked for at present. Even brokers' circulars, which continue to go out despite indifferent markets, can scarcely pretend that the time to buy is at hand.

One firm looking at the present position sees the immediate prospect as a further fall 'until the precise effect of the Government's measures becomes apparent'.

Another, known for its humour, strikes a wry note by saying that the investor geared to defensive investment may be wondering just how defensive he can get, and if his thoughts turn to investing 'in tins of food and warm topcoats before the ration books appear' it will be a brave man who tries to dissuade him.

That, of course, is a humorous over-emphasis but it indicates the market view in the equity field, though the demand for the continually appearing high coupon stocks holds up fairly well.

At present the trend is to hold on to good class shares because these have, to a large extent, been brought down in a general rather than individual reaction and must contain inherent potential for sharing in any recovery.

At the same time, if the Government is challenged strongly on the wages front, markets could go lower still. It may need a good deal of patience to follow the advice of 'hold and ignore the market', particularly if calling in of overdrafts brings further liquidation, and the market is unwilling to take stock on to its books.

EVIDENCE accumulates that the slow-down in building activity following the Government's July measures is affecting the big companies in the trade. London Brick, for instance, says that profits will be 'appreciably lower' and sees the future hard to forecast.

Holland and Hannen and Cubitts, the building contractors, take a long look at the position in the latest 'Cubitt

Index' and say it is now 'an irrevocable fact that the National Plan targets for the building industry, which were quite feasible eighteen months ago, cannot be met within this space as a result of the Government's July measures'. Orders for private house building must necessarily fall short of last year's total of £693 million and may be as low as £600 million, says the Index.

That itself is an indication of the outlook by an important industry which was among the stock-market's big growth prospects only a very short time ago.

ARRANGEMENTS are in hand for a placing by Lazard Brothers & Co of £6 million 8½ per cent Tonnage Debenture Stock 1988 of The British Oxygen Co Ltd at par.

At the annual general meeting of B.O.C. in February this year, the chairman stated that the board were discussing with their advisers the method of obtaining the further capital which would be required in due course. In April the holders of the existing debenture stocks gave their consent to amendments to the trust deeds securing their stocks to give B.O.C. the power to borrow on the security of its tonnage gas supply contracts.

The contracts to be used initially are all for bulk supplies to steel companies. They run for periods of fifteen years, with one exception (twelve years).

The present issue represents the first to be made under B.O.C.'s new powers and marks an interesting departure from the standard form of security normally offered in the case of quoted debenture stocks. The proceeds will be used towards the repayment of present bank overdrafts which have to a large extent been incurred in financing tonnage plants already in operation and towards financing the building and commissioning of new plants to be operated under similar contracts.

Structure of the Profession

SIR, - In his excellent letter (August 20th issue) Mr Kenneth West is so right to suggest it should be possible to devise a scheme by which professional members of the Association are absorbed by the Institutes of Chartered Accountants, which move would be welcomed by every practising certified accountant worth his salt.

Until professional accountancy is firmly and properly controlled by one body, our present ills will become more and more chronic, so even as a first urgent step could this not now be achieved as being an obviously necessary logical outcome of the talks initiated by the Institutes earlier in the year?

As long ago as January 1957, farseeing accountants advocated that the Association approach the Institutes with a view to practising members of the Association being taken over, and had the wisdom of such a move been recognized, the profession would now be in a far more healthy condition than in fact it is.

The longer the delay the more chronic will become the malady, and in consequence the recovery will take much longer than it should.

Yours faithfully,

Stoke-on-Trent.

GUY S. PEARCE, F.A.C.C.A.

D.C.F. and P.V. - Who's Approach?

SIR, - In your issue of August 20th, the article 'What's in a name - D.C.F. or P.V.' by calling the known interest rate or present value method 'the American approach' and the unknown interest rate method 'the British approach', is adding new names to concepts already excessively christened.

A. J. Merrett and G. Bannock in Business Economics and Statistics (1962) make the distinction quite clear: page 25 - 'The net (their italics) present value offered by a capital project is simply the sum of all the discounted future cash sums to which it gives rise less its initial capital cost'; page 27 - 'The I.R.R. (implied rate of return) of a project is that rate of interest which discounts the future net cash flows down to a present value which is equal to the cost of the project'.

I.R.R. had previously been named 'the marginal efficiency of capital' by Keynes and has subsequently been called the internal rate of return method as well as D.C.F. No useful purpose will be served by introducing national prejudices into the subject, especially since I.R.R. takes no account of the realizable value of the capital asset. I.R.R. is also incapable of evaluating capital projects in the course of operation. The epithet 'British' should be reserved for better quality techniques.

Yours faithfully.

London W1.

P. L. GRIFFITHS.

The Productivity Problem

SIR, - In The Accountant of July 30th, it is stated under the heading 'The Last Chance' that Britain's root problem is not the balance of payments - it is low productivity and high incomes. Much has been written about the necessity of increasing productivity but little to explain in simple language WHY it is so necessary.

On the contrary, the press, the radio and television all combine, by their undue emphasis on games and sport, to give the impression that they are the things that matter as opposed to work and responsibility.

How are we to 'generate the economic climate required to encourage greater productivity'?

If a fraction of the space and time given to sport were allotted to the clarification of matters relating to the economic and serious financial situation of the country, then the vital necessity for increasing productivity might be apparent to the general public.

Yours faithfully,

R. J. BLACKADDER, C.A.

Guildford.

Close Companies: Profits

Mr STRATTON MILLS asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, having regard to the Government's request for a dividend standstill, what direction he is giving to the Inland Revenue concerning publicly quoted close companies which increase their profits and are required by the Finance Act 1965 to pay out 6 per cent of their profits thus increasing their dividend; and if he will make a statement.

Mr MACDERMOT: As indicated in the White Paper on the Prices and Incomes standstill the obligation on companies not to increase distributions during the twelve-month period is subject to an exception for distributions to meet the requirements of the special tax rules for closely-controlled companies.

Hansard, August 1st, 1966. Written answers, col. 26.

Capital Gains Tax

Sir G. NABARRO asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is aware that, notwithstanding no statutory authority to require divulgence by taxpayers in respect of chargeable assets for capital gains duty held at April 6th, 1965, Her Majesty's Inspectors of Taxes are requesting such information and that taxpayers are often gratuitously submitting information concerning such chargeable assets; and whether he will now instruct Her Majesty's Inspectors of Taxes throughout the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland to cease requesting such information.

Mr DIAMOND: One or two isolated instances have come to notice. I am satisfied that no general instruction is needed.

Hansard August 9th, 1966. Written answers, col. 288.

Corporation Tax: Company Profits

Sir C. OSBORNE asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he is aware that a public company, whose name has been sent to him, has just announced sales reductions for the first half-year of £432,000, net profit reduction of £511,000, and that this type of profit-margin squeeze will be general throughout British industry; in view of the fact that the dividend cut will result in less revenue from taxation of profits and dividends, and that the Budget estimates will be falsified, if he will now impose severe cuts in current non-productive Government expenditure; and if he will make a statement.

Mr DIAMOND: The net profit reduction in the case mentioned will not affect the yield of corporation tax this year because tax on those profits will not be payable until 1967-68. For the same reason any reductions in the profits of other companies for accounting periods ending in this financial year will have little or no effect on the Budget estimate for 1966-67. It is too early to say to what extent reductions in dividends will cause the yield of Schedule F tax to fall short of the estimate. The Government will continue to exercise strict control of public expenditure, and will have regard to all relevant economic factors, including forecasts of revenue.

Hansard, August 9th, 1966. Written answers, col. 290.

Surtax: Surcharge

Mr EVAN LUARD asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he intends that the proposed 10 per cent surcharge on surtax for 1965-66 shall be payable by the personal representatives of taxpayers who died in that year.

Mr CALLAGHAN: No. The Income

Tax Acts already provide that the surtax on a person's income for the tax year in which he dies shall not exceed what it would have been if the income had been charged at the rates in force for the previous year.

Hansard, August 10th, 1966. Written answers, col. 363.

Surtax Surcharge: Capital Gains Tax

Mr BROOKS asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he intends the proposed 10 per cent surcharge on surtax for 1965-66 to apply in calculating capital gains tax payable on the alternative basis under section 21 of the Finance Act 1965.

Mr CALLAGHAN: No.

Hansard, August 11th, 1966. Written answers, col. 396.

Companies: Change of Name

Mr LOMAS asked the President of the Board of Trade whether he will consider introducing amending legislation allowing him to direct a company to change its name after the six-month statutory limit when it is obvious the title of the company was based on an erroneous judgment.

Mr JAY: I will consider this proposal when the time comes to propose amendments to section 18 of the Companies Act 1948, but it is not my intention to propose amendments to that section in the Companies Bill which I hope to introduce in this Session.

Cogent Comment on R. & D.

FASHION (which started with men and passed to women, only to be returned to its inventors) is fickle and changing; and it is as applicable to business situations as it is to private ones. The current business fashion is for research and development and there is every indication that on this occasion private enterprise is sharing an interest with Government. Thus the National Research Development Corporation, in its annual report published on August 18th, says it will need more public money soon because it is becoming increasingly involved with supporting innovation in the private business sector. The Times commented on August 19th, that 'this is a long-term condition of solvency' which 'will require wider investment by industry'. The principle implied can quickly be accepted, provided no one falls into the error of thinking it is always wrong to buy-in the finished product of someone else's research.

The General Educational Trust of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales and the joint authors – Mr J. BULLOCK, A.C.A., A.C.W.A., and Mr F. CLIVE DE PAULA, T.D., F.C.A., F.C.W.A. – can therefore be congratulated on producing No. 2 in the Management Information series of booklets, entitled Research and Development – The Key to Future Profitability,<sup>1</sup> at just the right moment. Here are under a hundred pages of topical, readable comment on the planning and control of research and development.

Basically the booklet describes an accounting corset in the modern idiom – control without chafing restriction; magic fingers smoothing the unwanted pounds away. The authors express this 'living girdle' approach in these words: 'We (the accountants) must rise above our exclusive concern for control of expenditure to a dynamic approach to research policy that will for each enterprise lay the foundations of increased future profitability.'

This is excellent as a statement of intent, and the booklet is presented as a challenge to business management to appreciate the far-reaching effects of research decisions on the total company profitability; and to accountants to develop accounting information systems that aid management in more effective research decision-making. It is also good to see quotations from engineers and those engaged in research work stressing the need for effective accounting control of research and development work. The case for this accounting control needs to be made frequently and forcefully, lest accounting and research may otherwise seem to be diametrically opposed.

The new booklet contains seven chapters and a conclusion; the essence of it lies in Chapters IV-VII which deal with organizing for, planning, and controlling research and development. What is said is simple, useful and well-presented. The authors acknowledge their reliance on their own earlier work in this field and on the work of other writers. The sources quoted are wholly relevant and slightly unusual, so that the resulting bibliography is stimulating. But it is the principle that they establish by this method that is important. In this series of booklets there is neither the time nor the need to try to push back the frontiers of knowledge. What has to be done is to show accountants in the mass something of the scope of modern accountancy and the quality of good thought that has already gone into the development of their skills, but which so far has passed largely unrecognized and unused.

Business Planning and Control – the first booklet in the series published a few weeks ago – lifted its subject outside the narrow confines of traditional accounting and served to show the extent of the accountant's usefulness to the business world and the breadth of vision that he can be expected to bring to his work; Research and Development shows how foolish it would be for the research worker to think of the accountant as a lacer of stays. Instead he should see the accountant as an ally who will help him to argue for a proper emphasis to be placed on research work of various kinds, and will suggest ways of measuring what is a proper allocation of financial resources for such work.

Following the lines suggested by Messrs BULLOCK and DE PAULA, the accountant can also help to create a proper organization for research and development work, and can sell to all but the most unimaginative of managements not only the need for research but the practical steps that need to be taken to ensure that value for money spent on research is obtained. If accountants can help to get this attitude generally adopted, they will not only benefit the researcher and please the N.R.D.C., but should also delight shareholders who must by now be disenchanted with investments in businesses which do not sufficiently consider the natural process of decay – graphically referred to in Chapter II – and therefore do not properly protect their capital.

With the publication of the second booklet in the Management Information series, it is easier to understand what the series hopes to achieve. It is quite clear that the series is not intended to constitute a do-it-yourself management reporting kit. It neither could nor should attempt to do this. Instead, it seems to be demonstrating – a fact which a large number of people have been suspecting for some time, occasionally rather resentfully – that accountants can develop their basic skills to a point at which they can be applied to a very wide range of business problems and can constitute a highly practical set of tools for use by management.

The Management Information booklets should thus stimulate a better understanding of accounting skills outside the profession, and, perhaps, more detailed study by accountants of some of the things lightly referred to in the actual booklets. Thus Research and Development assumes a knowledge of discounted cash flow, and of various ways of analysing projects for financial planning and control reasons, which cannot be considered common knowledge among the members of the profession. Indeed, judging by only the first two in the series the accountant who reads the Management Information booklets without becoming aware of huge gaps in his knowledge will be entitled to feel a little smug – very temporarily, since accounting thought is developing rapidly – whilst the others will find themselves forced back to their studies.

So Mr BULLOCK and Mr DE PAULA have presented a modern corset – 'foundation' is their word – for research and development. It is fully up to date in design and perhaps it is also right that it should be highly coloured, in line with modern trends. But it does seem that at the beginning of their work they have allowed their enthusiasm to get slightly out of hand: research and development, which is the 'key' in the title, has become the 'corner-stone' on the first page and (oh happy etymological marriage) the 'keystone' on the third page. And by this point it is being urged not 'to wither away in ivory towers' (do dons really enjoy less longevity than old soldiers?), and a distinctly nationalist flavour has crept in with a reference to 'Old Boney'. All these purplish passages occur in the first chapter. Chapter II strikes 'at the very soul' in its first line, packs in a tremendous advertising punch for research and development, and leads into Chapter III which neatly annexes for the research function practically the whole of management activity, including specifically, use of labour, materials and resources; quality control; management and organization, and communications. This, surely, is empire-building which is neither logical, necessary nor helpful. By Chapter IV, however, all is forgiven as the authors settle into their stride and write lucidly and convincingly about the real subject.

Because there are many more booklets to come in the Management Information series we think it worth making these observations in the hope that similar irritations can be avoided in the future – just as the Trustees (or their proof readers) have entirely avoided the typographical errors which were distracting when reading the first booklet in the series.

If the whole series is going to be as good and practical as the first two booklets, then the profession is in for a stimulating time.

Estate Duty and Life Interests

ON December 15th, 1965, the House of Lords held, in effect, that what has come to be known as the 'grafting operation' was effective for avoiding estate duty on settled funds. This was in Ralli Brothers Ltd v. C.I.R. when their lordships reversed the decision of the Court of Appeal reported at 43 A.T.C. 376.

Section 40 of the Finance Act 1966 seeks to put the Inland Revenue into the position they claimed to hold in the proceedings in that case. It does so in language which was the subject of bitter attack both on second reading and at the Committee stage as being incomprehensible 'mumbo jumbo'. Indeed, subsection (3) was recast, in tabulated form, in order to meet some of the criticism, but no one can contend that it is easy to follow even now.

In construing a section of an Act of Parliament, the Courts look at the mischief which was intended to be remedied. This is also a useful aid for the ordinary person seeking to find out what a section means. It will therefore be helpful to review the comparatively simple facts of the Ralli case.

Under a marriage settlement made in 1895 (about a year after the Act imposing estate duty was passed), Mrs RALLI became entitled to a life interest in certain funds. She also had a power to appoint the funds among her issue as from her death. By a deed of appointment dated December 5th, 1961 (when she was 85 years old), she exercised her power of appointment by irrevocably appointing the funds (subject to her own life interest) to two named grandchildren absolutely. They were both over 21 so thereafter they and Mrs RALLI were the only persons having any interest in the funds.

The day after the appointment the two grandchildren assigned to Mrs RALLI their interest (if any) in the income of the funds arising or accruing down to December 31st, 1965 (when Mrs RALLI would be 89 if she lived that long). The assignment expressed the intention that the assigned interest should merge with Mrs RALLI's life interest, hence the reference above to 'grafting'. The assignment also expressed the intention that the life interest should be enlarged into an absolute interest in the income down to December 31st, 1965, or until the death of Mrs RALLI, if later. Within three weeks after the assignment Mrs RALLI died and the Inland Revenue claimed estate duty on the whole settled fund – unsuccessfully as it turned out. They had to be content with estate duty on the actuarial value, as at the date of death, of the right to receive the income for the ensuing three years, which passed as part of Mrs RALLI's estate.

At first sight it is astonishing that the execution of a simple document, a few days before a life-tenant's death, should have such far-reaching consequences on the estate duty liability. To avoid these consequences the Revenue put forward many alternative arguments but all failed. The one that came nearest to succeeding was that based on section 2 (1) (b) of the Finance Act 1894 which imposes duty on:

'(b) Property in which the deceased or any other person had an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased, to the extent to which a benefit accrues or arises by the cesser of such interest;' [with immaterial exceptions].

Despite the assertion in the deed about 'merger', it was held that there was in fact no merger in the technical sense. Lord UPJOHN deprecated the use of such terms as 'enlargement' or 'aggrandisement' of a life interest or a 'coalescence' of the two interests; he said they were meaningless. The question was purely one of construction of the documents and their legal effect. There was no enlargement or coalescence; Mrs RALLI continued to have both a life interest and also an interest in income following her death, assuming she died before December 31st, 1965; but these meant that she had a vested interest in the income until that date.

UPJOHN, L.J., said it was established that section 2 (1) (b) dealt with a change of beneficial interest, not a mere transfer of title. Therefore, before it could apply, there must be one beneficial interest which ceased and another beneficial interest which arose or accrued to some other person. Here the income was enjoyed by Mrs RALLI down to her death; immediately after her death it went to her estate although under a different instrument. However, the fact that the source of her title changed was not enough to establish that her beneficial interest ceased. A person and her estate were one.

The stage is now set for the statutory enlargement of section 2 (1) (b) which section 40 seeks to make. The section appeared in the original Bill as quite a short clause of twenty-five lines. In its final form it covers sixty-five lines – partly as a result of prodding by critics in the House of Commons. It applies only to deaths after May 3rd, 1966, and it defines the scope of section 2 (1) (b) as to determining:

(i) whether an interest in property ceased on the death; and

- (ii) the extent to which a benefit accrued or arose by the cesser of that interest (section 40 (1)).

Section 40 (2) reads (our italics):

'40 (2). If the deceased had immediately before his death an interest in the property limited to cease on his death, then in determining the questions in subsection (1) above as regards that interest, any other interest in that property belonging to the deceased at his death shall be treated as if it belonged to someone other than the deceased.'

At the committee stage a new sub-clause (3) was added about discretionary trusts which were declared in a new sub-clause (6) to 'include':

'a trust under which the disposition of any of the trust income is at the discretion of the trustees or of any other person'.

Section 40 (3) applies where the following conditions are satisfied:

- (i) immediately before the death of the deceased;
- (ii) a number of persons were together entitled to an interest in the property;
- (iii) the persons at (ii) were entitled as beneficiaries of a discretionary trust;
- (iv) the interest at (ii) was 'limited' to cease on the death;
- (v) the deceased either:
  - (a) was one of the persons in (ii) at the time indicated in (i); or
  - (b) at some earlier time had been a beneficiary under the discretionary trust.

Given the satisfaction of these five conditions, then, for the purpose of deciding the two questions in section 40 (1) as regards the 'interest' at (ii) above:

- (vi) any other interest in the property;
- (vii) whether it arises under the same trusts or otherwise;
- (viii) which belongs [sic] to the persons in (ii);
- (ix) is to be treated as being held [sic] by persons who are neither the persons in (ii) nor the deceased.

So far, section 40 speaks of the same person having different 'interests' which somewhat begs the question. However, subsection (4) (which was also copiously amended at the committee stage) provides for separation into separate 'interests'. Section 40 (4) is expressed to apply for the purposes of:

- (i) section 40;
- (ii) section 43 of the Finance Act 1940 (determination of a life interest during the life of its owner)
- (iii) section 28 of the Finance Act 1958 (life-tenant paying for the reversion).

It begins by declaring that:

'an interest including an interest limited to cease on death shall be treated as two separate interests one of which is the interest limited to cease on death'.

It would appear that here there is another example of faulty drafting. Presumably by the word 'including' the draftsman really means 'which includes'. No doubt he had the Ralli case much in mind, and as we have indicated above it is only by studying that case that one can begin to understand what he is driving at. However, some clarity creeps in later in the subsection by some deeming provisions. The following interests are deemed to include an interest limited to cease on a death (i.e. presumably each one of the following interests is so deemed):

- (i) an interest enjoyed under two or more titles [sic] one of which confers an interest limited to cease on death;
- (ii) an interest so related to a death that it cannot terminate before the death.
- (iii) an interest so related to a death that, except in contingencies not related to the death, it cannot terminate before the death.

Given the inclusion of (iii), one is left wondering what was the object of including (ii). The apparent object of the two taken together is to strengthen the Revenue's position under section 22 (1) (l) of the Finance Act 1894 which extends the phrase 'on death' to include 'at a period ascertainable only by reference to the death'. (In the Ralli case, Lord UPJOHN expressed some doubt as to what (if any) meaning section 22 (1) (l) had.) Item (i) obviously has Mrs RALLI's own case in mind.

Now one of the advantages of a discretionary trust of income is that the death of one of the objects leaving at least two survivors is not treated as attracting estate duty. The Crown is apparently anxious to continue this immunity, even for deaths after May 3rd, 1966. This appears from the proviso to section 40 (4) which reads:

'Provided that where an interest belongs to persons as beneficiaries under a discretionary trust which throughout the subsistence of the trust was such that it could not terminate before the death of the survivor of two or more persons, estate duty shall only be payable by virtue of this section in respect of the cessor [sic] of the interest on the death of that survivor.'

The awkward use of the word 'only' makes the proviso literally ambiguous, but no doubt the draftsman does not mean that other charging provisions are excluded. A 'cessor' is a person who imposes a tax or levy, which makes the proviso meaningless. However, it will presumably be construed on the footing that 'cesser' was intended.

There are two sections which postulate circumstances in which 'property would have passed' or 'estate duty would have been payable'. They are section 43 of the Finance Act 1940 (dispositions of life interest before the death), and section 28 (12) of the Finance Act 1958 (life-tenant purchasing the reversion). Section 40 (5) of the new Act declares (probably unnecessarily) that section 40 is to have effect for the purpose of answering the questions posed by those two provisions, as well as for the purpose of actually imposing duty.

One does not need to be a tax expert to see that section 40 is going to put a lot of money into lawyers' pockets – by way of argument as to what it means, and by way of thinking up schemes to avoid it.

Current Affairs

Revenue Office Turmoil

THE outburst from delegates at this year's annual conference of the Inland Revenue Staff Federation, noted in The Accountant of May 28th, confirmed the increasingly evident fact that many Revenue offices are scarcely able to cope with their work-load and that the capital gains tax was in the nature of the last straw on the proverbial camel's back.

A summary report of a meeting in June of the Chief Inspector's Branch Whitley Committee in the current (August) issue of Taxes, the I.R.S.F. journal, provides another peep at the turmoil behind the scenes in the Revenue service. However, while it seems that life in tax offices is still hectic – for example Schedule E assessments are in arrears – in the provinces the local Inspecting Officers have been reporting that the work situation is better than they have ever known it. But in London the picture is very different; according to the Chief Inspector of Taxes it could only be said that there special assistance and overtime, together with relief from the provinces, 'had saved the day'. The root problem in London was finding competent officers, and the difference in the state of work between London and the provinces was growing rather than diminishing.

The Chief Inspector went on to observe that the organizational problems arising from the introduction of corporation tax, Schedule F tax and capital gains tax were 'immense'. Head Office had coped with them remarkably well, but their efforts had resulted in a heavy flow of instructions to Districts, which in turn were hard pressed to master the new subjects and at the same time deal with the current work-load.

Training arrangements for the capital gains tax were entrusted to the Districts, not so much because a central training programme was impracticable since there were no staff available to carry it out, but because of the wide variation in District needs. Moreover, the indications so far were that the burden of the capital gains tax would be heavy in some fifty to eighty Districts, while in the other six hundred and fifty or so the tax would have a relatively smaller impact; wholesale expenditure of time on capital gains tax tuition would therefore be wasteful.

It is more than a little interesting to read in the report the Chief Inspector's comment that while Tax Officers (Higher Grade) were trained to read instructions independently, and would in practice gain much of their knowledge from working actual cases, 'it was essential that they should not be over-meticulous in their approach to the capital gains tax. A broad brush was necessary'.

The Problem of the £

THE fight to save the £ is not only being waged in the financial centres of the world. Behind the scenes, its future is also being decided by a series of running battles between the Chancellor of the Exchequer who, on behalf of the Government, has decided to back the £-cent- $\frac{1}{2}$  system when decimal currency is introduced, and a number of institutions and individuals who feel that the 10s-cent system would be more suitable to the country's requirements.

The latest body to take the field is The Consumer Council who opened fire with a letter from its chairman, Baroness Elliot of Harwood, to Mr Callaghan in May. The Council takes its stand on two main points – that the 10s-cent system would make the transition easier for individual consumers and that the presence of smaller denominations strictly within the decimalized range would lessen the likelihood of a rise in prices caused by 'rounding up' on conversion.

Replying to the Council's arguments in a letter to Lady Elliot, Mr Callaghan expresses the opinion that the public will be given ample time to become accustomed to the new system and that there would be no significant difference between the two systems in their effect on prices. He adds that the new Decimal Currency Board which will regulate the changeover would be charged with watching prices to see that there were no unnecessary rises.

This is all very well as far as it goes but two disconcerting arguments also put forward by the Chancellor are that he considers that in the 10s-cent system the 1·2d unit would eventually outlive its usefulness and, further, that the £ unit would be better able to withstand the erosion of time. These submissions suggest the tacit acceptance of the inevitability of inflation with the probable consequence of eventual devaluation – two symptoms of deterioration to be avoided if the currency, in whichever units it is measured, is to regain the main characteristic of monetary strength, and that is stability.

This is My Life

by An Industrious Accountant

THE pool of water was quite small when I first saw it on my way to the front gate on Monday morning. It was on the lawn about a yard from the wall and a quick check indicated a leak in the main water pipe to the house.

With the modern accountant, trained in dynamic management techniques, quick and vibrant under executive stresses, to think is to act. Within a minute I was dialling the plumber's number.

With the modern plumber the tempo is somewhat slower, more reminiscent of the golden years of youth. It was several minutes before his wife answered the phone, some few more before he himself took over, and longer still before he decided he couldn't make it till next week. All these blokes returning from holidays, he indicated, were keeping him run off his feet. Still, he'd see what he could do.

When he hadn't done anything by Wednesday mid-day a change of plan became necessary. Here surely, I reasoned, was the opportunity for our colleagues to rally round to aid their stricken fellow. We had in our company a maintenance department simply studded with skilled craftsmen whose brawny brilliance should be at our call. We had often helped them with personal problems of tax or life insurance or temporary cash shortages; now was the time for a modicum of reciprocity.

Our chief maintenance engineer, a tousle-headed hustler from beyond Cardiff, was prompt to act. 'There is glad I am to help, bach', he grunted, sum-

London Visit of Japanese Accountants

ON August 23rd, thirty delegates from the Japan Federation of the Tax Accountants Associations visited the offices in London of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales. Informal discussions took place between the delegates and members of the Institute on aspects of the corporation and capital gains taxes.

The visit concluded with a short talk on the development, structure, nature and scope of the accountancy profession in the United Kingdom and the presentation of Sir Harold Howitt's book The History of the Institute to Mr Kanjiro Tanaka, Vice-President of the Federation.

moning his assistant with a shout to the next room. 'Get old Joe on the double to mend our friend's water pipe – on the job at 9 in the morning', he barked. I departed, relieved and gratified.

On Thursday afternoon there was an agitated telephone call from my wife to ask why no old Joe. The pool had by now spread across the lawn. An inspector from the waterworks had called and made acid comments about water wastage. I dropped the phone and went over to the maintenance office to inquire.

'Joe's on three days' leave in lieu of overtime – we overlooked that yesterday', the deputy replied amiably. 'Was there something you wanted? No, Taffy – that is, the chief – is at a conference.' I rang the plumber but nobody knew where he was to be found. Finally, the deputy located a stout replacement to come on Friday.

He came on Saturday evening – because of course he couldn't miss watching the match on the telly. He tiptoed gingerly over the soggy grass and uncovered the pipe. He brooded over it a while, then announced that it was leaking. I agreed with his diagnosis and pressed for remedial action. 'You didn't tell me it was a lead pipe', he said sadly. 'I'll have to come back on Monday; it's a big job wiping these joints'.

On Sunday I dug a channel to drain the pool into the gully-trap, a smart manoeuvre which my wife found difficulty in explaining to the inspector on Monday. Our staff man failed to clock in on Monday, but the Cardiff man, breathing fire, promised help without fail for Tuesday.

The plumber arrived unexpectedly on Monday evening and fixed it in half an hour. Then Joe came early on Tuesday and dug up half the lawn looking for the leak because there was nobody at home to stop him.

It's a wonderful fringe benefit to have helpful colleagues in an emergency.

Annual Report on Companies

THE number of new companies registered in 1965 was 36,315 – a decrease of about 25 per cent on the number for the previous year – according to the Companies General Annual Report for 1965 published by the Board of Trade last week (H.M.S.O., price 3s 6d). Nearly all the registrations were of private companies.

The total number of companies on the registers now exceeds 519,000, of which nearly 504,000 are private companies. During the year, 9,548 companies were dissolved or struck off the registers and winding-up proceedings were begun in 7,084 cases, of which 834 were compulsory liquidations.

The report gives information about some of the responsibilities of the Board of Trade under the Companies Act. For instance, the Board rejected some 36,500 suggested names for companies, mostly on the ground of their being too like existing companies, while in addition the Board received over 12,000 applications for approval for a change of name. A section on Board of Trade prosecutions under the Act shows that there were 1,249 prosecutions for failure to file annual returns.

The report also states that the Board, under the provisions of section 161 (1) (b) of the Act, authorized for appointment as auditors 132 persons who were not members of the recognized bodies (i.e. the three Chartered Institutes and The Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants) making a total since July 1st, 1948, of 1,870 as follows:

	From July 1st, 1948 to December 31st, 1964	1965	Total
(a) Having similar qualifications obtained outside the United Kingdom .. .. .	748	76	824
(b) Having obtained adequate knowledge and experience in the course of employment by a member of a recognized body of accountants ..	299	38	337
(c) Having before August 6th, 1947, practised in Great Britain as an accountant ..	691	18	709
	1,738	132	1,870

It is interesting to note from the general statistics of the Companies Registration Office that there were over one million public inspections of the Office's files during the year – considerably more than double the number inspected a decade ago. The Office also received nearly one and a quarter million documents for filing.

The Meaning of Book Debts

Registration of Company's Charges

by W. H. D. WINDER, M.A., LL.M.

THE term 'book debts' besides being a well-recognized expression in accountancy practice has a legal significance for certain purposes. For example, 'a charge on book debts of the company' is one of the specified charges which, if created by a company, requires registration (Companies Act 1948, section 95 (2) (e)).

In this kind of context a precise legal meaning has to be given to the term as a matter of statutory interpretation. The Courts are sometimes called upon to give this. When this task fell to Mr Justice Pennycuik in the case of Paul & Frank Ltd v. Discount Bank (Overseas) Ltd ([1966] 2 All E.R. 922), he heard evidence of accountancy practice as to entering items as 'book debts' and as to the scope of the expression. He evaluated the evidence of the witnesses and accepted the substance of it. In the action the plaintiffs' claim failed on a legal interpretation of section 95 (2) (e) of the Companies Act, but even if the interpretation advocated by the plaintiffs had been judicially upheld, the judge said the claim 'would fail on the facts, namely, the evidence of accountancy practice'.

This evidence was given by four witnesses who were 'chartered accountants of standing'. One gave evidence on behalf of the plaintiffs, one on behalf of the first defendant, and two on behalf of the second defendant. The question was whether a letter of authority to pay money which might become due under an insurance policy which guaranteed a buyer's liabilities to his seller, was a charge on book debts. Both in law and in accountancy practice it was held not to be such a charge.

Authority to pay insurance money

The plaintiff company, which carried on an export business, completed in the month of January a letter of authority to the Board of Trade Export Credits

Guarantee Department (the second defendant in the action), in the standard E.C.G.D. form, authorizing the Department to pay direct to the company's bank (the first defendant) any moneys which might become payable under a policy then in preparation for insurance of the liabilities of the company's foreign customers. E.C.G.D. were 'guarantors in consideration of the premium paid' by the company to which they agreed to pay a percentage of the amount of any loss from defined causes, including the insolvency of the buyers and their failure to pay the company the price due within six months after the due date.

The facts were that the company's bank discounted a bill of exchange accepted by the foreign buyers of the company's goods. The bank paid the company some £4,000. The bill of exchange, however, was not met on presentment in May, which was several months after the completion of the policy of insurance with the E.C.G.D. In July a petition for compulsory winding up of the plaintiff company was presented and a winding-up order was made.

In April of the next year the E.C.G.D. made payment to the bank under the policy, the foreign buyers having become bankrupt. The company's letter of authority to the E.C.G.D. authorizing such a payment to the bank was not registered under section 95 of the Companies Act 1948. Should it have been so registered and was it void against the company's liquidator for non-registration? The company and the liquidator brought an action against the bank and E.C.G.D. claiming a declaration by the Court that the letter of authority created a charge on book debts within section 95 (1) (e).

No book debt

All four accountants who gave evidence agreed that at the date of the letter of authority the E.C.G.D. policy ought not, in accordance with accountancy principle, to be entered in the books of the company as a book debt. When Mr Justice Pennycuik said 'in accordance with accountancy principle', he meant 'in accordance with the ordinary double-entry system adopted by accountants'. The witnesses said that in practice such a policy would not then be entered in the books of the company. This evidence was accepted.

Evidence was also given as to the next stage, that is to say, after the contingency under the policy had happened but before the liability was accepted by the E.C.G.D. and the amount due ascertained. The expert witness for the plaintiffs deposed that, in his view, the policy ought to have been entered in the books of the company in accordance with accountancy principle. This particular witness had had no personal experience of E.C.G.D. policies. On the other hand the three accountants called by the defendants deposed that at that stage it would not be in accordance with accountancy principle to enter the policy in the books of the company; and further, that at that stage such a policy never is, in practice, entered in the books of a company. On this point Mr Justice Pennycuik accepted the evidence of the accountants called for the defendants.

Then came the final stage at which the liability under the policy had been accepted by the E.C.G.D. and the amount ascertained. The witness for the plaintiffs considered that as a matter of accountancy principle the policy should already have been entered in the books of the company: a fortiori, in his view, it should have been so entered at this stage. The accountant witness for the first defendant said that as a matter of principle an entry as a debt could be made, but that it would be unusual. Of the two witnesses for the second defendant, one said that it could be entered as a book debt and the other said that it would be wrong to enter it until the amount was agreed. But all these latter three witnesses agreed that even at this stage it was not the practice to enter the liability of the E.C.G.D. as a debt.

On all this evidence the judge found, first, that as regards accountancy principle it would not be contrary to principle either to enter the liability of the E.C.G.D. as a debt or not to enter it as a debt – that is to say, that as a matter of principle either course would be legitimate. Secondly, he found as a matter of practice, the liability of the E.C.G.D. even at that stage is not entered as a book debt by companies concerned with E.C.G.D. policies.

To avoid misunderstanding, the judgment adds that all the accountants, either in terms or impliedly, agreed that some form of record or memorandum of the E.C.G.D. policy would have to be kept by the company concerned. Further, if it so happened that a balance sheet date had occurred, at any rate between the date when the liability was accepted and the amount ascertained and the actual payment by the E.C.G.D., the rights of the company under the policy would have to be reflected in whatever is the appropriate way in the balance sheet in order to show the true position of the company.

A book debt even if not entered in a book

As a matter of ordinary speech, the judge said that he did not think 'one would describe as a book debt the right under a contingency contract as that right stands before the contingency happens'. By 'contingency contract' in this connection he meant contracts of insurance, guarantee, indemnity and the like.

'By "book debts", the Legislature doubtless intended to describe debts in some way connected with the trade of the bankrupt; and I am inclined to give the term a wider range. But it is enough to say that this was a debt connected with and growing out of the plaintiff's trade.'

This is a quotation from the judgment of Erle, C.J., in the case of Shipley v. Marshall ((1863) 14 C.B.N.S. 566), who concluded by saying that, 'to constitute the debt a "book debt", it cannot to my mind be necessary that the transaction should be entered in a book'.

Referring to the argument that the words can only mean debts which are actually entered in the course of trade, one of the members of the Court in the Shipley case (Williams, J.) said he could not accede to that construction; he thought it was 'a debt arising out of a transaction which in the ordinary course of business would find its way as an entry into the actual trade-books'. As a third member of the Court (Byles, J.) put it, 'such debts as are commonly entered in books'.

If there were any differences between the ways in which the idea has been put by various judges, Mr Justice Pennycuik in the recent case said that he would accept the way in which Byles, J., put it. Reference was made to an explanation given in a case in 1962 (Independent Automatic Sales Ltd v. Knowles & Foster ([1962] 3 All E.R. 27)) by Buckley, J., in the following terms:

'So far as I am aware, no more precise definition of the meaning of the term "book debts" has ever been attempted judicially and I shall not attempt one. Shipley v. Marshall, I think, establishes that, if it can be said of a debt arising in the course of a business and due or growing due to the proprietor of that business that such a debt would or could in the ordinary course of such a business be entered in well-kept books relating to that business, that debt can properly be called a book debt whether it is in fact entered in the books of the business or not.'

A certain difficulty is caused by the use of the words 'would or could'. But bearing in mind that Buckley, J., talks about 'the ordinary course of business' and 'well-kept books', it seems clear that he was intending to apply what may be called a practical rather than a theoretical test; the test being whether it is the practice in well-kept books to enter, in the ordinary course of business, the debt in question.

Date of creation of charge

Counsel for both sides in Paul & Frank Ltd v. Discount Bank (Overseas) Ltd addressed their arguments in great part to the nature of the company's right at the date when the contingency under the policy occurred, or alternatively the date when the liability of the E.C.G.D. was accepted and the amount ascertained. But even if this is the true test, the findings by the judge on accountancy practice would have decided the case in favour of the defendants. It was also decided that this was not the true test.

Section 95 of the Companies Act requires registration of a charge on book debts within twenty-one days of creation and, said Mr Justice Pennycuik:

'It seems to me that in order to ascertain whether any particular charge is a charge on book debts within the meaning of the section, one must look at the items of property which form the subject-matter of the charge at the date of its creation and consider whether any of those items is a book debt. In the case of an existing item of property, this question can only be answered by reference to its character at the date of creation. Where the item of property is the benefit of a contract and at the date of the charge the benefit of the contract does not comprehend any book debt, I do not see how that contract can be brought within the section as being a book debt merely by reason that the contract may ultimately result in a book debt. Here the E.C.G. policy admittedly did not comprehend any book debt at the date of the letter of authority, and that seems to me to be an end of the matter.'

Counsel for the plaintiffs contended that a contract requires registration under paragraph (e) of section 95 (2) if at any time it may result in a book debt. If this were right the section would be of wide scope and would cover a charge on any possible contract which might produce a money obligation unless it could be shown that the obligation, even when admitted and quantified, was such as is not commonly entered in the books of the company. Such a contention has been authoritatively rejected.

Charges on future book debts

There is another relevant principle illustrated by the case of Independent Automatic Sales Ltd v. Knowles & Foster cited above. A hire-purchase agreement was in issue and on its true interpretation the hirer became liable immediately on the agreement coming into operation, to the extent of his minimum liability under it notwithstanding that some part of that liability was to be discharged by future payments. Buckley, J., said that a charge on future book debts of a company is registrable under section 95. It is competent for anyone to whom book debts may accrue in the future to create an equitable charge on those book debts which will attach to them as soon as they come into existence (see Tailby v. Official Receiver ((1888) 13 App. Cas. 523)).

That such a charge can accurately be described as a charge on book debts does not appear to be open to question. Such a charge would not, of course, be effective until a book debt came into existence on which it could operate. Nevertheless, it would be accurate to speak of the charge being created at the date of the instrument, deposit or other act giving rise to it, for no further action on the part of the grantor would be required to bring the charge to life.

Unlike counsel in Paul & Frank Ltd v. Discount Bank (Overseas) Ltd, the judge himself did not think this view of Buckley, J., was wrong. If a charge, on its proper construction, covers future debts in the sense of debts under a future contract which when that contract comes to an end will constitute book debts, there is no reason why section 95 (2) (e) should not be applicable to the charge. That is all that was meant. It by no means follows that the section applies to an existing contract which does not comprehend a book debt merely by reason that that contract may result in a book debt in the future.

The Present Practice and Modern Developments in Auditing in the United States of America—III

by R. KIRK BATZER, A.B., M.S., C.P.A.

Considerations arising when other auditors participate in the examination

THESE matters of discovery of irregularities and reporting of accounting deficiencies become more complex for the auditor when clients are large, when their operations are widespread, and particularly when other auditors perform part of the examination. While it is rather uncommon with us, there are nevertheless numerous cases where other auditors perform part of an engagement, or audit subsidiary companies. In recent years, the relationship that exists, or that should exist, between the auditors of a parent company and the auditors of a subsidiary has been the object of increasing attention.

59. Our Securities and Exchange Commission and our own Institute require as a minimum that the principal auditor make some inquiry as to the independence and professional reputation of the subsidiary auditor. When the subsidiary and its auditor are located in another country, the following portion of our Institute Code of Ethics applies:

'A member or associate may—utilize, in part, to the extent appropriate in the circumstances, the work of public accountants in other countries, but the member or associate so doing must satisfy himself that the person or firm is qualified and independent, that such work is performed in accordance with generally accepted auditing standards, as prevailing in the United States, and that financial statements are prepared in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles, as prevailing in the United States, or are accompanied by the information necessary to bring the statements into accord with such principles.'

60. In the face of these requirements, members of our Institute have no alternative but to go beyond the perusal of an auditor's report coming from another country. Since the quoted portion of our Code of Ethics has been in effect only a short period of time and since, to my knowledge, there have been no publicized complaints or proceedings involving this portion of the Code, I cannot tell you how our Institute's Trial Board or how Law Courts in our country would express themselves in this matter. I am sure that members of your Institute who are auditors for subsidiaries of publicly-owned American companies will experience a wide variety of inquiries as a consequence of this requirement. I would expect that in most circumstances the auditor of the subsidiary will be asked to respond to a questionnaire, or to furnish a letter to the principal auditor describing the scope of his work. In some engagements, particularly on initial engagements, the principal auditor may ask to review the audit programme and working papers. In other cases, where the relationship is long standing, no additional inquiry may be made.

61. The matter of accountant's liability is very serious for us; there are a number of lawsuits pending against accountants for allegedly inadequate work on their part. Any inquiry that may be made of your members is likely to be motivated by a desire to establish that the principal auditor has taken all steps available to him, and is unlikely to be motivated by mistrust or a feeling of uneasiness as to work done. I hope your members will comply with all reasonable requests for information.

The impact of electronic data processing

62. I think we should be surprised to find how many among those giving me their attention have already experienced an encounter with electronic data processing work. To an amazing and truly dizzying degree the world is being automated. Computers are a part of everyday life, and our generation of auditors must learn to deal with consequences whereby substantial segments of accounting activity are so automated.

63. An important consideration in the audit of E.D.P. (electronic data processing) systems and one which has been the subject of much discussion and numerous articles, is whether the auditor should audit 'around' or 'through' the computer.

64. Auditing 'around' the computer means that a representative sample of transactions is manually traced either from source to final reports or from the final report back to source documents. This tracing is done by using the computer printouts as if they were manually maintained records. The thesis is that if the sample of transactions has been handled correctly, then the system output can be considered to be correct within a satisfactory degree of confidence.

65. Auditing 'through' the computer means that, where possible and necessary, the controls, procedures, and data used by the computer system are checked by using the computer itself. The thesis is that if the source information is correct and if the controls and procedures are judged to be satisfactory, then the system outputs can be considered to be correct. Auditing 'through' the computer emphasizes the procedural approach to audit tests, whereas auditing 'around' it stresses the idea of making tests of the characteristics of the output.

66. The main advantage of the 'around' approach is that the ordinary auditor is on familiar ground; he is not required to have a technical knowledge of the computer to the degree necessary when the 'through' approach is used. The approach independently tests the results produced by a system which relies upon a fallible machine controlled by fallible people.

67. It appears that the 'around' approach may become more difficult to use. New system design is tending to reduce the auditor's access to familiar entities presented in familiar terms. Such design may increase the consolidation of data not subject to audit with data that is subject to audit, for example, a personnel file that is combined into a payroll-personnel file. In addition many different uses are being made of a single transaction. With the increasing use of wire transmission of data, source documents are being stored at remote points, and often in a sequence which is not related to the sequence in which the corresponding data are stored by a centralized computer system. The absence of visible records in certain very sophisticated systems, in which transactions are processed and acted upon at the time they occur, may make it difficult to audit 'around' these systems. A familiar and simple example is the savings bank deposit system in which a deposit may be made with a teller at a branch office and the account balance updated at the same time in the main office's central computer installation.

68. In addition, this approach may not be able to provide management with the same degree of assurance that the internal controls in the E.D.P. system are in fact working as does the 'through' approach. With the reduced number and wide dispersion of source documents, the reduced amount of information printed out for examinations, and the machine and programming nature of controls, assurance about internal controls may become difficult to obtain by traditional means.

69. The advantages of the 'through' approach are that it can provide direct assurances as to the functioning of the system and that it affords the opportunity to use more precise audit techniques. The computer can be used to select items for detailed analysis, and perform some or all of this analysis. The main disadvantage of the 'through' approach is that the auditor must first prepare himself with intensive training in the concepts of E.D.P. systems and machines, and then must deal with a considerable amount of technical detail during the individual audits.

Probable audit trends in electronic data processing systems

70. For some years, auditing 'around' the computer will remain feasible because most E.D.P. installations provide printouts of a satisfactory scope and frequency. However, I believe it is important that auditors develop the knowledge and skills necessary for using the computer as an audit tool. As strong trends in the E.D.P. field increase the difficulty of auditing 'around', there is likely to be a corresponding tendency to use the computer itself as the audit instrument. To prepare for this, it is necessary both to recognize the changes that have occurred and anticipate the changes that may be expected.

71. The installation of an E.D.P. system introduces the possibility of new types of errors in processing of data. Much of the data to be fed into the computer must first be manually punched into cards or paper tape, and this key punching operation can introduce error. Each step or process that translates data into a new form increases the potential for error. The computer operator can use the wrong magnetic tape for a computer operation, can use an obsolete version of the program (the procedures which the computer follows in processing the data), can process the same data twice, or skip a batch of data. An error may also be made in a computer program itself.

72. In many systems, E.D.P. has caused a gradual loss of the printed audit trail. Some devices are now used for feeding transactions directly into the computer, with no printed record of the transaction being produced. Also, there has been a reduction in the printed outputs which show the status of the file records and a history of the transactions affecting each of the file records.

73. Offsetting these developments which tend to increase errors have been the very high reliability of the computer itself and the ability to develop special manual and programmed measures to reduce the incidence of errors and to increase the efficiency of detecting those which do occur. Data which have been entered into the computer will be processed according to the program with a very high degree of assurance, and both manual and programmed control measures can enhance that assurance.

Internal control requirements for electronic data processing systems

74. In the face of the new factors in the error environment that accompany E.D.P., controls are necessary at each stage of the data processing. The auditor must determine, in the course of his audit, whether these controls exist, whether they are adequate in the specific situation, whether they are being followed, and how they can be checked. It is necessary for the auditor to identify those transactions for which he will need to check the procedures for ensuring the authority, propriety, and accuracy of transactions. Traditional controls will apply to many types of transactions, such as requirements for all overtime be authorized by foremen, that all pay rate changes be channelled through the payroll department for authorization, etc. For other transactions, however, E.D.P. has introduced a new factor in that the computer can initiate important transactions, such as purchase orders and production orders. Where this has occurred, management must clearly understand just how much authority has been granted to the computer program, and checks are needed to make certain that the bounds of this authority are not exceeded.

The use of the computer as an audit tool

75. There are two basic ways the computer can be used as an audit tool:

(a) by test decks; and

(b) by specially written computer programs.

76. A test deck is a set of dummy transactions created to simulate actual events in order to test the procedures and controls in a computer program. The term has been borrowed from programming, because a programmer must develop a similar set of transactions for testing a new program. The auditor may use test decks to gain a better understanding of what the data processing system does, and to check its conformity to desired objectives. Thus, they may be used to test the accuracy of programming by comparing computer results with results predetermined manually. They may also be used to determine whether or not errors can occur without observation, and thus test the system's ability to detect non-compliance with prescribed procedures and methods.

77. Assurance is provided by the fact that if one transaction of a given type passes a test, then all transactions containing the identical test characteristics will – if the appropriate control features are functioning – pass the same test. Accordingly the volume of test transactions of a given type is not important.

78. To test the system's compliance with prescribed methods and procedures, test decks may be designed both for particular transaction handling features and for general system features. Representative tests of transaction handling features would be:

- (a) the effect of missing transactions, such as an employee's checking in on a job without having previously clocked in for the day;
- (b) the handling of erroneous transactions (either deliberate or accidental), such as charging time or materials to improper accounts;
- (c) the handling of illogical conditions, such as inventory issues that exceed on-hand quantities or payroll deductions that exceed an employee's gross pay;
- (d) validation checks performed by the computer, for example, to see if the checks catch credit limits that are too high, or a credit limit change that is too large, or missing fields of information in input transactions.

79. Computer programs can be specially written to accomplish a variety of audit objectives, using the computer ability to select, classify and analyse. Our firm believes that considerable further working experience is needed before any definitive compilation can be made of the specific audit situations in which these abilities will be most useful.

80. There are three important prerequisites thereto:

- (a) the auditor must be able to define his audit objectives and requirements;
- (b) he must be able to program his requirements or have access to a programmer who will reliably fill them; and
- (c) the required time and effort should be justified by the results achieved.

81. Programs can be written to select items randomly in cases where the auditor wishes a test to include a representative cross-section of transactions in an account with printout of the selected items in the form necessary for the auditor's purpose. For example, computers can be programmed to select individual accounts receivable for confirmation, prepare and address the confirmation form, and in the case of positive confirmations, prepare second requests and reports of unconfirmed accounts as well as those requiring some other manual follow up. The computer can also be used to select inventory items from the records for test by the auditor or to compare inventory test counts with the records.

82. Programs can be written to identify all items that fail to meet particular criteria. To check whether policy has been followed, the computer can check all records in a file for failure to conform to prescribed standards.

83. Programs can be written to stratify items by age, dollar value, etc. Such programs might be used to analyse an account for activity, identifying those items with no activity for three months, six months, nine months, etc., or to analyse records in a file by dollar value. In each instance the decision to use the computer for selection and analysis of records depends upon the relative efficiency of such use as compared with manual performance of the same function. In some cases manual analysis of available printout information may require less time than that required to write special computer programs; however, the possibility of subsequent use of the program should also be considered.

84. As systems tend to reduce the availability of printed-out information, the computer approach may need to be increasingly used. In some cases, the computer user may compensate for the reduction in printouts by developing programs of his own to serve the same control and analysis purposes described, so that the auditor will either use the company's program for his purpose or, where appropriate, apply compliance tests to judge the reliability of the data.

The need for additional training

85. With the growing need for auditing 'through' the computer, there is a growing need for the auditor to learn more about E.D.P. In the past, discussions of this subject have centred around the need for the auditor to learn programming. The auditor understandably resists learning a new, highly technical language that is not directly related to his auditing responsibilities. The computer people have advocated programming training, not to make a programmer out of the auditor, but rather to demonstrate what a computer can and cannot do.

86. As we consider not only the future, but even the present state of our profession, we must ask ourselves – Who are going to perform these tasks involving mature judgement and extensive technical training? Our Institute has long held that the examination is to be performed by a person or persons having adequate technical training and proficiency as an auditor.

87. In our country, we find that we must generally require that young men coming to the profession have a university education which has included suitable instruction in theory and practice of accounting and auditing. Many of our professional societies and individual firms conduct extensive training courses in a wide range of subjects; many of these courses which have been newly established are concerned with an understanding of the electronic computer, an ability to understand its characteristics and the vernacular that is associated with it. These are difficult, expensive and, we feel, necessary undertakings if our profession is to continue as a useful factor in our economic life. I am confident it will so continue. I thank you for the opportunity of sharing these thoughts with members of your distinguished organization.

Accountants in Retirement

by RONALD SHERBROOKE-WALKER,
C.B.E., T.D., D.L., F.C.A.

RETIREMENT seems remote when you are in the full swing of practice, despite all the exhortations to provide for your old age. The literature pours in upon you with pre-paid postcards and business reply envelopes for obtaining full details of your would-be benefactor's schemes. The demand to 'State age next birthday' pulls you up with a start, and sometimes a harrowing picture is included showing the artist's impression of your wife and children grieving at your untimely death.

But you feel that the end of your active professional life is something which can never happen to you – like your house being burnt down or a £25,000 win in the Premium Bond draw. In any case, how could the firm go on without you and what is the outlook for your clients without your knowledge and skill to guide them? But inexorably the years roll on and the time comes.

Some people leave it too long – we all know them. 'Can't afford to retire, old boy. Besides what would I do? Potter round the garden and change my library book?' But sooner or later small things – not, we hope, large ones – start to bring it home to us that it is time we went, although we still feel in good form if a little more tired when the day's work is over.

Or it may be that the predetermined date has come and we mustn't try to hang on. The remaining partners don't want to have the old man hanging round their necks for ever – even though they may have to go on seeing his face for a while if our retirement notice says 'Available for consultation'. But what, do we imagine, will this amount to? Will clients really want to go on with the old when a new partner has taken over our jobs?

Incidentally, it is an intriguing pre-retirement exercise to decide which partner is to take over our various clients. Is 'A' too young? Is 'B' too busy? Could 'C' cope?

Anyway, the day comes at last and we feel quite an affection for the 8.37 as it bears us to the office for the last time. Thereafter we shall travel up at a more civilized hour – and perhaps get a seat!

What is the manner of our going? Naturally we make a round of the offices to say 'good-bye' to the staff, and we assure each other that it is not good-bye – we are sure to meet lots of times in the future. Maybe we shall if we don't retire to Cornwall and the 'consultation' affair means more than a conventional phrase in our retirement notices.

When some grand old man goes on his way after forty or fifty years in the firm, it is usually quite an occasion. The partners throw a dinner for him and 'amongst others' are some of the rather special clients, the firm's solicitor and perhaps the local Inspector of Taxes. He may be honoured by the presence of the mayor or the archdeacon. He will have one more aperitif than his wont, a good dinner and the wine will flow.

Then, inevitably, the new senior partner will be on his feet saying a lot of nice things about him, most of which seem hardly credible. (One must have made a better dc of things than one realized, or is the speaker merely being conventionally kind? Full of good cheer one inclines towards the former, but later on one wonders.) Then they have him on his feet and he returns the compliments – loyal and helpful partners . . . splendid staff – and all the things thousands of other people have said before in the same circumstances.

Others go with little ceremony – they are made that way. The good-byes, of course; and perhaps a drink after the office closes and home in time for dinner.

Whichever it is, when it's your turn you face the problem posed for you by your friends, 'What will you do with yourself now you have retired?'

No problem for some

For many retired accountants this is no problem at all. They have directorships, committees, and other interests and hobbies to which they can now give more time. The garden probably benefits and wives are thankful for more help with the chores. In fact, they are as busy as they were in practice, if less tied to hours.

But those who have confined themselves to practice and taken little or no part in public life or social work do find retirement something with which they have to get on terms. For them everything seems to come to a full stop. A move into a new house, or a long-promised trip abroad, may fill the gap for a time but after that they cannot potter round the garden or play golf all day.

Unless our retired accountant blossoms out and is drawn into activities for which he feels he never had the time or inclination before, he will soon find himself at a loose end and it will worry his wife as well as himself. You will soon see him scanning the advertisement columns in the papers for a part-time job.

Everyone has to solve the problem one way or another but there is something (or someone) they all miss terribly at first unless they keep a leg in business and at least an office desk – their secretary!

Accounting for Hotel Management

by T. J. BARRETT, F.A.C.C.A.

Gee & Co (Publishers) Ltd, London. 30s net.

This admirable book is by a certified accountant who is company secretary of a large hotel group. It deals with all aspects of hotel accounting, from the preparation of guests' bills to final accounts and balance sheet. Its subject is wider than accountancy pure and simple, and covers related topics such as hotel organization, hotel registers and advanced booking records. It is full of well-designed forms and clear examples.

Mr Barrett emphasizes that any actual accounting system must be tailor-made for the hotel using it, but the system he describes and illustrates – in just the right amount of detail for easy comprehension – should be easily adaptable to any type and size of hotel. The use of accounting data and records for management control purposes is emphasized, particular stress being laid on the use of comparative data from past periods, and of proportions and ratios.

It is possible to criticize the book only on comparatively minor grounds. It contains no bibliography, which is unfortunate as the work should prove useful to qualified and trainee accountants in the industry, as well as to the trainee managers for whom it is primarily intended; in fairness, it should be pointed out that regrettably few British books on accountancy contain a bibliography. The author does not deal with marginal costing, standard costing or budgetary control, but as the book seems to be concerned primarily with the day-to-day operation of small- and medium-sized hotels, this is, perhaps, an excusable omission.

The book can be warmly recommended to anyone interested in accounting in the hotel industry.

Managerial Cost Analysis

by JAMES M. FREMGAN

Richard D. Irwin Inc., Homewood, Illinois, U.S.A. $10.65. The central theme of this book – 'the usefulness of accounting information in the management of a business' discussed in the opening chapter, is fairly reflected throughout the book.

The author, a Professor of Management in a U.S.A. Naval Postgraduate School, seems to have set his sights overhigh in attempting to cover too wide a field in a single volume. The result is an excellent introduction to this important subject, rather than treatment in depth.

The book is well written and the student, for whom it is primarily written, should have no difficulty in following the substance of the text, notwithstanding the occasional differences in terminology from English textbooks.

The chapters on costs and cost accounting, including standard costs, are a useful introduction to cost accounting as a tool for managerial analysis before passing to more advanced textbooks on the subject. Budgetary control is also dealt with in a clear and concise manner.

The last seven chapters deal with 'Costs for decision making' and should be most helpful to the student who wishes to relate the study of accounting to matters of decision making by management. Those on capital budgeting, rate of return on invested capital and the role of costs in pricing decisions make interesting reading, the exposition being clear and well written. The closing chapter on 'Effective reports to management', however, could well have been expanded since many students have difficulty in presenting their conclusions in the form of concise reports.

Each chapter concludes with a series of questions, together with a number of practical problems.

Principles of Pension Fund Investment

by W. G. NURSAW

Hutchinson & Co (Publishers) Ltd, London. 40s net.

Pension Funds: Measuring Investment Performances

by PETER O. DIETZ

The Graduate School of Business, Columbia University and The Free Press, New York. London: Collier-Macmillan Ltd. 45s net.

Mr Nursaw's book is divided into two sections. The first part consists of seven short chapters dealing with various aspects of pension funds; the second and larger part is concerned with investments generally, viewed from the standpoint of the investment manager of a privately-invested pension fund. The book has the laudable aim of stimulating trustees and managers of pension funds to greater skill in the management of their funds.

The first part of the book is fairly general and although it may contain little that is new for the group to whom it is addressed, it will be of considerable interest to the wider readership. Within the small compass he permits himself for this section of his book, the author can hardly be exhaustive in his treatment and this is clearly not his aim. One could make many comments but two or three must suffice.

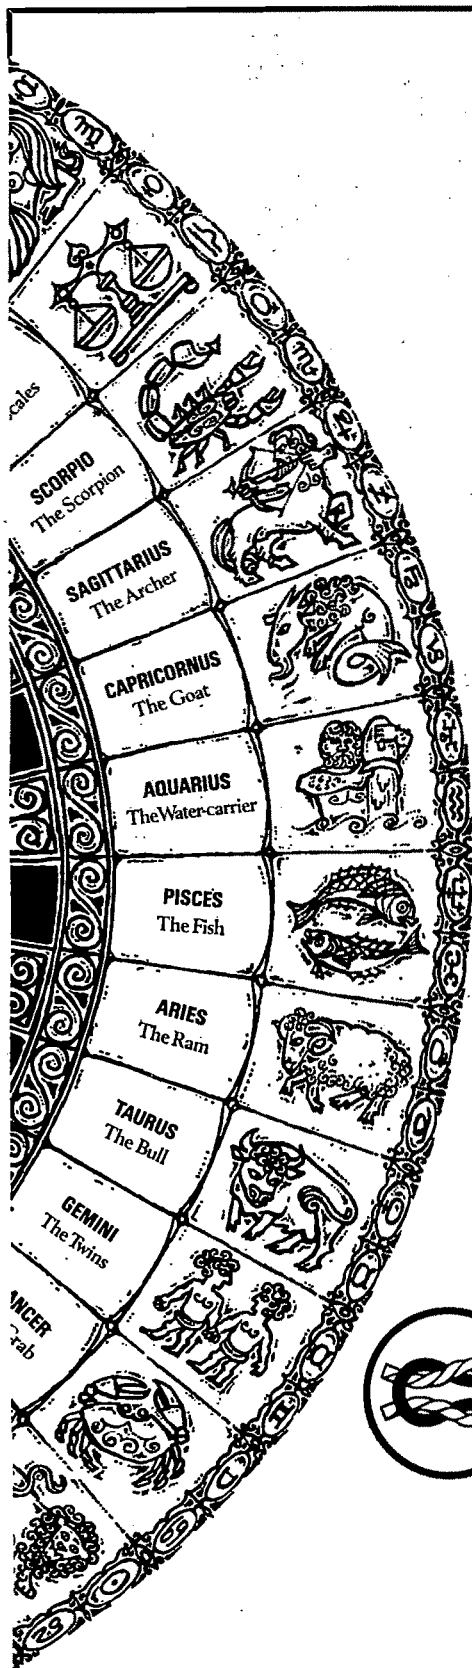

On pages 47–48 the author states:

'There seems to be some doubt as to whether pension funds pay income tax on their underwriting profits. The view is generally held that they are liable but I am aware that a number of pension funds who [sic] accept the occasional underwriting offer have not paid tax on the commission received.'

In brief the position is that provided underwriting commissions do not exceed annuities paid from the fund, they are not assessed for tax.

Actuaries – and others – would certainly wish to dispute the author's contention that equity yields should be taken as the dividend yield plus a minimum of 3 per cent in perpetuity. Also the conservative valuation rate of interest for which Mr Nursaw takes actuaries to task may be the means of achieving the very result he advocates, namely, the maintenance of the purchasing power of pensions in the future.

In the second part of the book Mr Nursaw is on ground

Is there a merger in your client's future?

As the pressure of events increases it is more important than ever for your clients to plan ahead. By talking to Chesham today, you can give them the initiative in choosing their partners for progress. This is obviously preferable to being rushed into a quick and perhaps rash decision later. More and more professional advisers are approaching us to discuss the many opportunities open to their clients in an increasingly competitive world.

Chesham's sole business is planned mergers. We have acquired considerable and unique experience and skill in effecting them. We have negotiated quietly, discreetly and always in a friendly atmosphere, transactions involving both industrial giants and small companies. And, of course, we meet professional fees arising from any negotiations you initiate.

You can approach Chesham in complete confidence without being committed to either expense or action. You have everything to gain . . . and nothing to lose. Mergers are our business. Mergers. Nothing else.

Representatives will call upon request, after which an economical inclusive quotation will be forwarded which is very much his own and it contains a great deal of good sense. Inevitably, there are many points on which one may not agree with the author. For example, many would certainly not agree that the basic portfolio should have 'a spread of fixed interest stocks by maturity dates from short-dated stocks to long-dated stocks, including irredeemable stocks'.

However, despite some shortcomings the book will perform a great service if it achieves its declared aim of making trustees and pension fund managers appreciate that it is their duty to earn the highest yield consistent with safety, and that high investment performance is the best guarantee that purchasing power of pensions paid from a fund can be maintained. One has the impression that some pension fund trustees are well content if they achieve a yield which is comfortably in excess of the conservative rate of interest used in the original actuarial costings. It is to be hoped that any such passive trustees will be stimulated by this book.

Dr Dietz's book is a text in a series sponsored by Columbia University's Graduate School of Business. Dr Dietz sets out to discover whether efficiency in the management of the investment portfolio of a pension fund can be measured. Mr Nursaw also devotes a chapter to the same topic and reaches the conclusion that performance tests are likely to prove frustrating and self-defeating.

Out of a study of two pension fund portfolios, Dr Dietz has developed a method which he uses to test the extent to which a pension fund has achieved its stated investment objectives. He has then applied this series of tests to four other anonymous United States pension funds, the records of which were made available to him and he uses the results to compare one fund with another. The tests were made on the results of each fund at quarterly intervals for the ten-year period 1953-62. For each fund the author attempts to measure three characteristics which he designates Strategic decisions, Tactical decisions and Timing decisions.

Under strategic decisions the author plots the performance of each fund on two axes, the yield and the standard deviation of the yield, which he uses as a measure of portfolio risk. To achieve a high yield with a low standard deviation is a valid objective of any privately-invested fund and Dr Dietz's results are therefore relevant to an examination of investment success. Whether the results are a measure of successful strategic decisions perhaps depends on the extent to which the overall investment objectives of a pension fund are set out in these terms.

In the succeeding chapters the author sets out to measure success in selection of investments and success in the timing of decisions in relation to the business cycle.

The six funds which Dr Dietz studied showed surprisingly different results and the tests he applies are effective in so far as they reveal these disparities. The book abundantly demonstrates the importance for a privately-invested pension fund of a soundly conceived and competently administered investment policy. Should anyone doubt the relevance of studies of this sort for United Kingdom pension funds, let him consider the graph published in The Economist of July 23rd, 1966 (page xxv of the 'Insurance Survey 1966'). This suggests that at least the timing ability of United Kingdom pension fund investment managers might be examined.

Ruston & Hornsby

THE Ruston & Hornsby company's accounts, from which this week's reprint comes, were issued when the company was faced with a take-over bid by the English Electric Company. The board's defence against the bid was an immediate increase from 10 per cent to 12½ per cent in the 1965-66 dividend, the announcement of a change in dividend policy leading to the forecast of an equivalently higher current year dividend of 15 per cent on capital being increased by '1 for 4' scrip issue, following a splitting of the £1 shares to 5s. All this was combined with a forecast of substantially higher current year earnings and with the announcement of an asset revaluation. To round the thing off there was a forecast of a further rise in profits for 1967-68.

To get a true view of Ruston & Hornsby's own group profits it is necessary to eliminate the dividend income from the group's 50 per cent interest in the equity of Ruston-Bucyrus Ltd. On that basis the record in round figures is a loss of £200,000 for 1963-64, a profit of £440,000 for 1964-65, and a profit of £650,000 for the year under review.

For the current year the profit on this basis is forecast at as high as £1,680,000, on top of which there is expected to be a maintained £720,000 dividend from Ruston-Bucyrus. The dividend policy (now presumably strangled at birth by the dividend freeze) is to distribute the bulk of the £720,000 plus 'an appropriate proportion' of the group trading profit.

Wider concept

The English Electric Company's bid of thirteen of its shares for every ten Ruston & Hornsby ordinary was rejected because, as the chairman, Mr J. F. Mallabar, says in his annual review, the terms did not seem to take sufficient account of the progress the company is making, nor of its sound and advanced technical position. Not that Mr Mallabar is against a regrouping of the heavy diesel engine industry.

'If three or four of us could combine our heavy duty diesel interests into one company basically concerned with heavy duty prime movers', he says, 'it would make a lot of commercial sense, and would most certainly be in the national interest, since our competitive power overseas would then be materially greater than it is today – or ever will be so long as we operate independently.'

The kind of combination Mr Mallabar has in mind could 'easily handle substantially the whole of British manufacture in the field involved and its strength against foreign manufacturers and foreign designs would be immense'. This is a broader concept than that of a merger with English Electric which, in Mr Mallabar's opinion, would not in itself attain the objectives at which he considers the industry should aim.

Depreciation policy

Referring back to Mr Mallabar's comment on earnings trends, he makes the point that profits in recent years would have been materially higher but for deliberate policy decisions. In 1964, £496,000 was spent on research and development, in 1965 £582,000 and in the year under review £648,000, the bulk being borne by the parent company. Just about one-half of the profit earned on manufacturing in the past year was spent on research and development.

A year ago Mr Mallabar reported a change in depreciation policy on plant and stated that the new basis was still very conservative. The charge in the current accounts is £684,000. Despite the changes already made, machines are still being written off in a period far shorter than their estimated useful life. This year a detailed examination of the whole basis of depreciation is being put in hand and this is expected to result in future in a 'lower but more realistic charge against earnings'.

As to the current year profit forecast of about £2,400,000, Mr Mallabar makes the point that, after only three months of the year, more than two-thirds of the group's overall sales budget of £28 million was already covered by orders for current year dispatch. Against this background a further increase in earnings is forecast for 1967-68.

Three years' purchase

On the revaluation of land and buildings now in hand, the chairman says that book values are considered to be 'very substantially less than their present day values'. On the basis of the group balance sheet, the book value of net tangible assets attributable to ordinary shareholders was £19,333,561 – equivalent to 60s a share. This includes the group's 50 per cent interest in the equity of Ruston-Bucyrus at only £4,500,000 the par value of the shares. Ruston-Bucyrus, however, earned profits of £3,193,000 before tax in its last financial year to December 31st, 1965, out of which Ruston & Hornsby received a gross dividend of £720,000. The group's investment in Ruston-Bucyrus is therefore shown in the group balance sheet at less than three years' purchase of the pre-tax profits applicable to the 50 per cent interest.

It will be seen, therefore, that the company has a useful case to make in its rejection of the English Electric bid but there is no evidence, as yet, that moves are being made towards the broader rationalization in the heavy diesel engine industry that Mr Mallabar would like to see. But his thoughts in that direction are in line with the current urge towards bigger industrial regroupings with an eye, particularly, on meeting competition in overseas markets.

During the year the Authorised Capital was increased by £1,000,000 to £8,000,000 by the creation of 1,000,000 unclassified shares of £1 each, and the issued Capital was reconverted into Shares.

Of the increase 288,202 shares were issued as Ordinary Shares of £1 each in part consideration for the purchase of the Ordinary Shares in The Bergius-Kelvin Company Limited. A further 18,048 shares remain to be issued to satisfy the balance of the purchase consideration of £32,725.

II. SHARE PREMIUM ACCOUNT

The Share Premium Account represents the excess of net assets acquired over the nominal value of shares issued to shareholders in The Bergius-Kelvin Company Limited.

Fixed Assets are shown generally at cost. A small proportion of the total value is included at independent valuations made in 1935 and 1953.

Outstanding commitments for capital expenditure amount to £325,000 (Group £400,000). No depreciation has been charged during the year on Land and Buildings in the U.K. (1965, £42,131).

VI. TAXATION

Investment Allowances have reduced the Group charge for taxation by £125,000.

The charge for Income Tax includes £71,000 in respect of the previous year. A further liability may arise for the same year as the assessment of a Subsidiary has not been agreed.

Deferred taxation of the Group by reason of Capital Allowances exceeding depreciation written off amounts to £26,000.

VII. NET PROFIT

The Group Profit and Loss Account does not include any profit of The Bergius Kelvin Company Limited as the Company was not acquired until 31st March 1966, the date on which the offer for purchase became unconditional.

The amount attributable to Ruston & Hornsby Limited has been reduced by £118,500 due to Subvention Payments to a Subsidiary Company.

The investment in Ruston-Bucyrus Ltd is shown at par value. Based on the Balance Sheet at 31st December 1965, the equity of Ruston & Hornsby Ltd in this Company's capital and reserves exceeded the par value of the investment by £2,194,892.

The financial year of our Australian Subsidiary Company ended on 31st December 1965. It would unduly delay the preparation of consolidated accounts if the accounting date coincided with that of the Holding Company.

There is a contingent liability of £45,000 for uncalled capital in respect of a portion of Trade Investments.

Directors' Emoluments. Payable by Ruston & Hornsby Ltd: Fees £1,700, Executive Services £90,817, Compensation £8,000. Payable by Subsidiaries: Fees £2,915. Total £103,432 (1965, £79,854).

Auditors' remuneration for the year, £3,252 (1965, £2,967).

The Close Company provisions of the Finance Act 1965 do not apply to Ruston & Hornsby Ltd.

Under the provisions of Section 85 of the Finance Act 1965, Income Tax deducted from the Preference dividend paid on 1st July 1966, and the proposed Final Dividend of 5% on the Ordinary capital payable on 26th August 1966, will be retained by the Company.

The market value of Ruston & Hornsby Ltd stocks on the 6th April 1965 for Capital Gains Tax purposes were:—

Ordinary 40½, 5% Cumulative Preference 13½, 6% Cumulative 'B' Preference 16½, 4½% Debenture Stock 62%, 6% Unsecured Loan Stock 92½%.

CITY NOTES

HOPES that relief from political debate when Parliament rose would also relieve strain on the stock-market have proved decidedly false. Prices have continued to fall through a combination of limited selling pressure and a virtually complete absence of support. Attempts to sell secondary shares have shown the market to be decidedly narrow and there is no doubt that heavier selling pressure would have had a very drastic effect on share prices.

There is no indication as yet that equities have reached a level at which new buyers are likely to be attracted. Stockbrokers are making out reasonable cases for selective equity support but dividend yields and price earnings ratios do not cut much investment ice under dividend freeze conditions.

That is particularly so when the industrial signs point only in one direction - towards a lower level of industrial output and of earnings. It is not the mere fact of the dividend freeze that perturbs the stock-market. The company that can afford to pay a frozen dividend next year will be well off.

THE Bovril board's decision to ask for an investigation into dealings in the company's shares provides yet another example of boardroom difficulty in timing the announcement of take-over talks. Bovril shares jumped before the talks were announced and fell before there was news that they had failed. The two movements seem to suggest that security somewhere was not everything it ought to have been, particularly since talks were still in a preliminary stage when movement in the price of Bovril shares obliged the directors to state that discussions were going on.

IN recent weeks, rights issues have inevitably been going through a difficult period. The equity slide has seen prices falling at a rate which has meant that 'ex rights' prices of shares have been pared down to the level of the new shares on offer. The result has been new shares left with underwriters to an uncomfortable degree.

The directors of Vaux and Associated Breweries and their brokers, Cazenove & Co, decided that it was necessary to give something more than normal rights inducement under present circumstances. The Vaux rights issue of 'one for four' at 20s a share was made on the basis of a price of 47s 6d for the existing shares with dividend forecast at 12½ per cent on the increased capital. That is the kind of rights basis needed to stand a chance of success now. There are, however, not many companies in a strong enough position to make an offer on such terms.

D.C.F. or P.V.?

SIR, - The contributor to 'Management Information' in your issue of August 20th, has I think over-stated the case for using the discounted cash flow rate of return in preference to a present value calculation for ranking alternative projects (whether or not the supply of cash is limited).

Where the two methods do not rank competing proposals in the same sequence, there seems to be no automatic method of deciding which of the two systems (if either) is correct. The criterion to be adopted in any case will presumably be that which, under the actual circumstances, involves the more reasonable reinvestment assumption.

I should welcome comments on the ranking of the following three projects.

Structure of the Profession

SIR, - I have read Mr Kenneth West's letter in your August 20th issue but am unable to agree that the qualifications he suggests are adequate or indeed equitable.

Mr West suggests that members of the Association employed in industry or commerce be taken over by The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants, and yet apparently chartered accountants employed in a similar capacity are not to be taken over in this manner. Unity of the profession will surely not be achieved by this method.

The qualifications suggested do not appear to cover the financial accountant employed in industry. I would suggest that an Institute of Chartered Professional Accountants should cover this function so that the only requisite to practise as an auditor and public accountant would be registration through a certificate granted by the Council subject to the applicant having the required experience.

Yours faithfully,

ALAN LLOYD, A.A.C.C.A., A.C.I.S., A.C.C.S.

Stoke-on-Trent.

SIR, - I see we are off again on a flow of correspondence on this topic, which will vary from one extreme to another. As one of the unfortunate 'unqualified' (in the eyes of certain authorities) I, as an accountant with twenty years' experience and a practice of 1,200 clients, would like to beseech the profession and officials who will be involved to give a speedy decision.

The level of quality between members of the accountancy profession will always resolve itself, but the impression outside the profession must be pretty confusing when even estate agents and plumbers are seen to be getting themselves organized.

Accountancy is no longer historic, but should be futuristic and dynamic - let us prove it.

Statistics for Business

SIR, - My attention has been drawn to a review of my book, entitled as above, in your issue of June 25th, 1966. One statement therein seems to me to be completely unjustified and misleading. This is:

'The author switches from sampling and significance to graphs, then to measures of association, after which he deals with averages . . . (my italics).

This would be a ridiculous procedure, if true. Actually, I deal very thoroughly with averages (the mean, the mode, and the median) in Chapter 5, pages 37-40, in between the chapters on Sampling and Significance (3 and 8 respectively). True, later on (Chapter 13) I deal with moving averages; but these are not so simple as to be mentioned earlier. In fact, I deal with 'Curves of averages' also before 'Significant differences'.

Your reviewer is quite entitled to his opinion that the chapters are not in logical order, and that the student working at home may get 'lost in the maze'. As a psychologist who has taught many classes of scientific assistants the elements of statistical analysis I disagree with him; but I realize that this is not evidence.

Yours sincerely,

Weybridge, Surrey.

L. J. HOLMAN.

[Our reviewer writes: I accept the correction regarding the location of Mr Holman's discussion of averages without accepting his opinion of its adequacy. The basic difference between us is simple enough. His treatment of the subject is, as his experience has shown, well adapted to the needs of scientific assistants in a department of psychology. My own view is that it would not be so satisfactory for the average accountancy student; such students can, however, browse through Mr Holman's book before making the purchase.]

Selective Employment Tax and the Accountancy Profession

Correspondence with the Chancellor

Letters sent to the Chancellor of the Exchequer by the President of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales on behalf of the accountancy bodies referred to therein, and the Chancellor's reply.

Letters dated July 1st, 1966, from the President to the Chancellor.

Selective Employment Tax and the Accountancy Profession

I am writing to you on behalf of the Councils of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, The Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland, The Institute of Chartered Accountants in Ireland and The Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants, to point out that the proposed treatment of members of the accountancy profession for selective employment tax purposes will, in their view, work against the public interest. We are writing to ask whether you would be willing to introduce amendments to mitigate these effects before the legislation is enacted (or if circumstances make this not immediately possible, at the earliest opportunity thereafter).

The bodies on behalf of whom I write feel very strongly that the accountancy profession is one of those whose value to the community is wrongly ranked for selective employment tax purposes. The point we wish to emphasize is that accountancy is an integral part of the nation's commerce and industry, particularly manufacturing industry, which requires now, more than at any other time, accurate information and up-to-date costs and other accounts for management purposes. While some activities may be arguably less essential than others, no business can operate efficiently, or indeed at all, without accounting services. They are not a voluntary or an avoidable expense. We also wish to emphasize that prompt assessment to tax on profits and collection of revenue depend very largely on adequate accounting.

We wish also to bring to your attention that the recent fiscal changes are imposing a severe strain on the profession and are in danger of creating a shortage of accountants qualified to deal with a mass of new and complicated legislation. There is therefore no possibility, under present circumstances, of selective employment tax having the effect on the accountancy profession for which we understand it was designed, namely, a saving of manpower or the release of manpower for other purposes.

The profession is affected in two ways under selective employment tax. First, accountancy services are excluded from the classes of activities eligible for refund for selective employment tax paid. Second, persons employed or in training as accountants are regarded as being engaged in a non-qualifying activity. The imposition of selective employment tax on those employed by public accountants will adversely affect commerce and industry in some measure by adding to the cost of essential accountancy services. Equally, for the reasons given above we suggest that it is unrealistic to rank accountancy as a non-qualifying activity for purposes of determining whether an establishment shall be eligible for claiming any repayment of selective employment tax.

We appreciate that it is for the Government to decide which activities it proposes to encourage by payment of premiums. But because of its importance to the efficient and economic conduct of the nation's business we urge that there should be remission of selective employment tax for the accountancy profession. We submit that this should be brought about first by enabling firms of public accountants to claim repayment of selective employment tax paid and second by exempting accountancy from the definition of non-qualifying activities set out in Clause 10 (1) of the Selective Employment Payments Bill.

If it would be helpful, representatives of the accountancy bodies on whose behalf this letter is written would be pleased to meet you or your representatives to amplify the views which have been expressed above.

Selective employment tax and the organization costs of the governing bodies of the accountancy profession

I am writing to you on behalf of the Councils of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, The Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland, The Institute of Chartered Accountants in Ireland and The Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants, together with the Council of The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants, to urge that selective employment tax paid in respect of persons employed by our respective professional organizations as such should be refunded.

These bodies are non-profit-making organizations carried on to advance or spread knowledge and maintain or improve standards of conduct and competence amongst their members. We therefore wish to submit that selective employment tax paid in respect of persons employed by them be eligible for refund. Such a concession would in our view be entirely in the public interest and consistent with the decision, recently announced, to enable recognized charitable organizations to claim repayment of the tax.

Letter dated August 12th, 1966, from the Chancellor to the President

You wrote to me twice on July 1st on behalf of the Councils of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, The Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland, The Institute of Chartered Accountants in Ireland, The Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants, and The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants, about the effects of the selective employment tax.

The White Paper (Cmd 2986) on the selective employment tax made it clear that, in addition to raising revenue and broadening the tax base, one of the main objectives of the tax is to improve the structure of the tax system by doing something to help redress the balance between services, which have hitherto been lightly taxed, and manufacturing, which has for a long time been subject to excise duties and the purchase tax. There was certainly no intention of penalizing the many worth-while service activities, by comparison with manufacturing industries, but simply of correcting an existing bias in the tax system.

In order to achieve this aim it was necessary that privately financed services as a whole should pay the tax without refund.

In imposing a tax on services I did not underestimate the importance to the economy of the many industries in the service sector which have an essential function. Neither do I underestimate the importance of your institutions, or the value of the services provided by your members; but many other professions and sectors of the service industries are equally useful and it is not possible to discriminate between them without striking at the very root of the scheme. The point is simply that hitherto, by comparison with manufacturing, the services sector has not borne a sufficient share of the tax burden.

In the light of the statement by the Prime Minister on July 20th, it is abundantly clear that all members of the public, and all sectors of industry must contribute to the measures necessary to restore our overseas payments to balance and get the economy on a sound footing. A full contribution from the services sector is vital, both in the short term, and as part of the economic framework which is essential in the longer term to sustain a healthy and robust economy.

The selective employment tax should also in the longer-term encourage a shift of labour from services to manufacturing, as the White Paper explains. But it is easy to exaggerate the immediate effects: it will operate more by helping to secure a higher proportion of new entrants each year for manufacturing than by diverting existing employees.

You ask me to accept that those of your members who are employees should not be regarded as engaged in non-qualifying activities. This expression is defined in clause 10 (1) of the Selective Employment Payments Bill as 'activities carried on for office purposes', and I do not think it would be right, even if it were practicable, to pick out a particular type of office work for exceptional treatment.

With regard to those of your members who will be most affected by the tax because they are in private practice and employ staff, I am afraid that the simple fact is that they provide a service, and it is on private services that the tax is intended to fall.

You ask that the selective employment tax paid in respect of persons employed by the governing bodies of the accountancy profession should be refunded. Under section 5 of the Selective Employment Payments Act, the Minister of Labour will be empowered to refund the tax to charities in respect of employees who do not otherwise attract premium or refund. It is not, of course, for the Government to say whether or not bodies which are not at present registered as charities could or should take steps to secure that legal status for themselves. What I can say is that although the Government recognize that there are some bodies which carry out similar functions to charities they do not believe that it would be right to widen the concession proposed in the Bill.

Mr C. E. Polden, D.S.C., A.C.A.

It is with much regret that we have learned of the sudden death at his home in Dublin on August 23rd of Mr Colin Ernest Polden, D.S.C., A.C.A., Secretary of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in Ireland. He was 49.

Born in Dublin, Mr Polden was educated at Wesley College and was subsequently articulated with the late Mr Thomas J. Morrison, of Dublin, being admitted to membership of the Irish Institute in 1941. He then joined the Royal Navy and served during the war on Arctic convoys and later was involved in tank landings in the Mediterranean where he was awarded the D.S.C.

On his return to Dublin at the end of the war, he worked for a short period with Craig Gardner & Co, Chartered Accountants, before joining Aspro-Nicholas of Ireland Ltd in 1946 where he became Secretary/Chief Accountant. He took up the appointment of Secretary of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in Ireland in May 1965.

During his schooldays, Mr Polden was captain of rugby at Wesley College, and also of Leinster Schoolboys. After he left Wesley, he played for Clontarf, including two Leinster senior cup finals, and then joined Old Wesley, where he was captain and later president of the club. He was a former president of the Wesley College Old Boys Union, and an active member of the Methodist Church community in Dublin.

Mr Polden is survived by his wife Freda; his son Colin and daughter Beverley.

NATIONAL INSURANCE CHANGES

Unemployment Benefit

The Minister of Social Security last week published regulations<sup>1</sup> modifying the rules relating to unemployment benefit as a consequence of the 1966 National Insurance Act.

The regulations set out in more detail the operation of a provision introduced by section 3 (1) of the Act that, for the purpose of the new earnings-related supplements, the first six days of a continuous period of suspension shall not be treated, as from October 6th, 1966, as days of unemployment. This provision will apply to flat-rate unemployment benefit from March 10th, 1969 - i.e. three years after the Act received Royal Assent.

The regulations modify the rules under which unemployment benefit may be paid for days of unpaid holiday and for 'normal idle days' and provide for transitional arrangements as at October 6th. They also modify the rules under which terminal payments made at the end of a person's employment affect entitlement to benefit.

NEW LOOK FOR POSTAL ORDERS

New-style postal orders are to replace the familiar design introduced in 1957. First to be affected is the £5 order, being issued in its new form this month. The new design will have improved security features and will enable records to be kept by computer.

The front of the new postal order will be appearing in three colours - green and two shades of brown - in place of the present green and black and the watermark, of oak leaves, will be placed so that it shows through the design more clearly.

The numbering system has been changed, from the present letter-and-figure code followed by six figures, to a ten-figure series. Normal arabic numerals are to be used on the counter-foil but on the order itself the serial number will be printed in magnetic ink characters for electronic reading. The numbers on paid orders will be read by electronic equipment at

Impossible to doubt the desirability of protection of this kind. Unfortunately, the very nature of most pension schemes leaves them largely at the mercy of long-term inflationary trends.

The solution can be a privately administered pension plan with wider latitude in its investment provisions. This is the basis on which we work at Chase Manhattan. In conjunction with an independent consulting actuary, we would aim to provide for you a plan which is weighted in favour of growth investment. Protection against inflation is, as a result, built in.

Company Law Reform

AS company law now stands its primary function is to provide a degree of protection for two groups, creditors and shareholders. With the growth of the shareholding public and the emergence of the 'small investor', even if his interest is often indirect through the medium of a holding in one of the many unit trusts, the case for reviewing his needs and the extent to which they can be met by legislation is obvious.

Yet this is not the sole or even the main requirement of reform. The bulk of the nation's industry and trade is conducted by concerns which operate within the framework of the Companies Act. It seems a self evident proposition that any change which might militate against the efficient conduct of business must be avoided. For example, should it be made more difficult for companies to raise capital from the public; to what extent could competitors benefit by compelling companies to make a fuller disclosure of their profitable activities? In the last resort the law must serve not only the needs of shareholders and creditors, it must also serve the public interest by ensuring that the nation's economic resources are used efficiently.

In a new Hobart paper (No. 37)<sup>1</sup> of the Institute of Economic Affairs, Dr F. R. JERVIS argues that there is no conflict between these objectives. Only by ensuring that shareholders and the investing public are given the fullest information is it possible to promote rational investment. At the present time investors are not adequately informed and with the trend towards mergers and take-overs the shareholder in a large and diversified concern has little, if any, knowledge as to how the board's decisions are paying off.

Dr JERVIS makes the point that the trend towards bigness through the acquisition of divergent interests is not necessarily in the interests of the economy, the company or the shareholder. The old dictum of sticking to one's last is as valid for boards of directors as it is for individuals. The evidence of experience the author cites, indicates that there is considerable truth in this view. In this context it becomes essential that published accounts should disclose the relevant contribution made by the different interests in a company and Dr JERVIS goes so far as to suggest that a clear statement of investment intention and expectation is also needed.

The role of institutional investors has been a matter for debate for some years. Dr JERVIS is quite clear that they have failed to exert the influence on boards that they could have done. The obvious conflict of interest posed in this argument is not easy to resolve and would, in any case, be irrelevant if shareholders and the investment public were to be given as much information concerning the company's affairs as critics such as Professor H. B. ROSE have urged. Given more informative accounts with detailed breakdowns of profits, and half-yearly – if not quarterly – statements on the trend of profits and orders, the financial Press could make itself really felt.

Dr JERVIS looks askance at the growth of amalgamation and the issue of non-voting shares which consolidate the already considerable powers of the directors, but he recognizes that one cannot legislate for efficiency. Whatever changes are ultimately made in the law relating to companies, anything which increases the information available to shareholders and strengthens their powers to intervene is to be welcomed.

There is more than one point of view on Dr JERVIS's thesis, but it can hardly be gainsaid that for all the current talk by industries about a social responsibility the simple fact is that the board's first responsibility is to its shareholders. If a new law helps to remind them of this it will be no bad change.

Working the Freeze

WHILE it would be too much to hope that the recent letter from Sir MAURICE LAING, President of the Confederation of British Industry, to its members outlining the fruits of the C.B.I.'s discussions with the Government on the standstill would remove all the confusion, it does help to clarify the situation in some respects.

Employers and trade unions are asked to make no new agreement which will become operative before January 1st, 1967, at the earliest, and to suspend for six months the operation of agreements or commitments which had been entered into before July 20th but as yet not implemented. In the context of the earlier White Paper on the standstill, 'implementation' means that any pay increase should have been paid or any shorter working week started before July 20th.

In addition to the four exceptions to the pay standstill set out in the White Paper, i.e. reimbursement of expenses to staff where these have increased; higher earnings for increased output where piece rate systems operate; genuine promotion and normal increments within a specified scale, the PRESIDENT's letter refers to other points. Where it has been the practice within a company to reward educational attainment, such payments to staff may be continued. Likewise, bonuses payable at Christmas or other periodic payment by result may also be made provided that bonuses do not exceed the amount paid on the occasion of the last bonus before the start of the standstill.

On prices the PRESIDENT asks the members to continue to operate the 'early warning' system by notifying Government departments of any proposed price increases. The C.B.I. has been informed by the Government that departments hope to be able to deal with such notification within the prescribed period of twenty-eight days. Sir MAURICE makes the obvious, but important point that the mere notification of future price increases will not of itself contain inflation. Price stability can only be achieved by the effort of all concerns to restrain increases in costs.

To this end Sir MAURICE in his letter urges member companies to make every effort to hold costs stable and to increase their prices only when there have been substantial increases in the cost of materials such as imported goods or bought-in components which it has proved impossible to absorb. Taxes and seasonal factors may also create conditions in which price increases are unavoidable.

On the subject of dividends the PRESIDENT's letter re-states the relevant requirements in the White Paper that there should be no general increase in dividends in the next twelve months. This statement has since been amplified by the Treasury to the effect that where a higher interim has already been paid in the current year, since the total dividend may not exceed last year's distribution, then the final payment will have to be reduced. In determining last year's distribution, any bunching of dividends that may have occurred to take advantage of the transitional provisions of the corporation tax must be ignored.

Provided the trade unions and organized industry are determined to make the standstill work, then the economy will certainly derive some benefit. But, these provisos apart, this still leaves unresolved the more serious issue of how the Government proposes in the future to run the economy to achieve the twin objectives of rapid growth and price stability. The present drift towards the extension of State control and the proliferation of controls is not the answer.

Donees and Estate Duty

WHERE a donor dies within five years after making the gift (or later, where he has not been entirely excluded from benefit) then the property comprised in the gift is deemed to pass on the donor's death. It is aggregated with the other property passing on the donor's death, thus increasing the rate of estate duty. At the same time, it attracts its own duty (at the increased rate) and the donee has to pay it.

It may be that the donee disposed of the gift before the donor's death, and that he did so in circumstances which involved him in the payment of long-term capital gains tax. In computing the donee's capital gain on such disposal, there is no provision for deducting estate duty which might subsequently be payable by the donee. It follows that the capital gains tax computation allows no relief for that prospective estate duty. Thus the donee may be paying 30 per cent capital gains tax on a sum of money which later he will have to hand over to the Revenue as estate duty on the inter vivos gift.

Section 42 (1) of the Finance Act 1966 provides for relief in these circumstances. The relief does not involve a recomputation of the capital gain. Instead, the donee is allowed to deduct the capital gains tax in arriving at the value of the property attracting estate duty. It follows that if the donor's estate attracts 80 per cent duty, the donee will be relieved of estate duty equivalent to 80 per cent of the capital gains tax. Perhaps a fairer relief would be simply to deduct the capital gains tax from the estate duty payable, or to deduct the capital gain from the estate duty valuation.

If the donee predeceased the donor and the donee's personal representatives disposed of the gift before the donor died, then they obtain the section 42 (1) relief. The donee may, of course, be a company or otherwise chargeable not to capital gains tax but to corporation tax computed on capital gains tax lines. Here again the company donee has the right to deduct the corporation tax in arriving at the principal value of the gift as at the date of the donor's death.

So far we have dealt with the normal case where the gift falls to be valued as at the date of the donor's death. Section 38 of the Finance Act 1957 contains some very complicated rules in this connection. Thus if the donated property is settled by the gift but the settlement comes to an end at some time before the donor's death (otherwise than through the property reverting to the donor) then the property is to be valued as at the date when the settlement came to an end and the value remains fixed for estate duty purposes (section 38 (8)). Now section 42 (1) of the 1966 Act does not apply to property which was settled by the gift itself. However, it is possible that after the gift the donee himself makes a settlement of the donated property, either by inter vivos settlement or by will. If he does this, before the death of the donor, then section 38 (8) applies (section 38 (9)). It may be that the settlement made by the donee itself comes to an end before the donor's death. In accordance with section 38 (9) the donated property is valued at that point and such value remains valid whatever happens to the property afterwards. In that case, it is only capital gains tax incurred on disposals made before or at the coming to an end of the settlement which is available for deduction under section 42 (1) of the 1966 Act.

Section 42 (2) of the Finance Act 1966 is concerned with the estate duty repercussions of capital gains tax liability arising under section 25 (3) of the Finance Act 1965. Section 25 (3) reads:

'On the occasion when a person becomes absolutely entitled to any settled property as against the trustee all the assets forming part of the settled property to which he becomes so entitled shall be deemed to have been disposed of by the trustee, and immediately reacquired by him in his capacity as a trustee within section 22 (5) of this Act' [i.e. as bare nominee] 'for a consideration equal to their market value.'

Now it may be that the settlement is of a gift and that on the subsequent death of the donor estate duty will be payable on it. The proviso to section 38 (8) of the Finance Act 1957 may apply so that the property is valued for estate duty at that time and, if the donor dies within the statutory period after the gift, estate duty will be payable on that value. Section 42 (2) provides for the deduction of the section 25 (3) capital gains tax from the value of the property for estate duty purposes.

Alternatively, it may be that the proviso to section 38 (12) applies. In other words, there may have been a life-tenant of the settled property whose life interest had already determined before the life-tenant's death and before or at the time when the settlement came to an end. There is thus a potential liability to estate duty under section 43 of the Finance Act 1940. By virtue of the proviso to section 38 (12) the property is to be valued as at the time the settlement came to an end and that value obtains for the purpose of the subsequent estate duty liability under section 43. Here again section 42 (2) of the 1966 Act provides that the section 25 (3) capital gains tax liability is to be deducted from that value.

It will be recalled that where more than two years have passed since a gift (or since the donor was entirely excluded from benefit) section 64 of the Finance Act 1960 provides for a sliding scale of relief from estate duty. This is given by way of a notional reduction in the value of the donated property. If the death takes place in the third of the statutory five years, then the reduction is by 15 per cent; increasing to 30 per cent in the fourth year and 60 per cent in the fifth year. This raises the problem of whether this percentage deduction applies to the full value or to the value as reduced under section 42 (1) (2). As might be expected, it is the latter. In other words, the capital gains tax liability (or corporation tax) is first deducted, and then one deducts the 15 per cent etc. permitted by section 64 of the 1960 Act.

Section 42 (1) (2) speaks of capital gains tax (or corporation tax) being 'chargeable' on a disposal or deemed disposal made before the donor's death (or the time when the value is fixed on the coming to an end of the settlement). Section 42 (4) says that references to any amount of capital gains tax or corporation tax 'are references to the amount which would not have been payable if the relevant asset had not been disposed of'. Presumably this also extends to cases where tax is payable because of some event which is deemed to be a disposal, but the contrary is arguable.

Suppose that on such disposal or deemed disposal a gain is thrown up but for some reason or other no capital gains tax or corporation tax is in fact 'payable'. Section 42 (4) preserves the deduction in one case and in one case only, namely, where the reason for the non-payability is the setting off of losses against the gain, whether current losses or losses brought forward from a previous year or accounting period. In such a case, one can take the tax which would have been charged on the gain if it had been the only gain of the year and had all been chargeable.

We indicated above that where, for instance, a donee disposes of the gift before the donor's death and pays capital gains tax, any subsequent estate duty liability of his on the donor's death is not allowed to interfere with the computation of the capital gain. However, the position is different if the donee disposes of the asset after the death. In this case, the capital gains tax computation can take the estate duty into account. This is allowed by section 42 (3) which applies not only to a gift which the donee still owned when the donor died, but also to property settled by the gift and to property which is treated by section 38 (9) as settled by the gift. The property must be deemed to pass on a death for the purposes of estate duty. In this context Northern Irish estate duty is also brought into account, but not Republican estate duty or any other overseas estate duty.

One must then compare two things as follows:

- (a) the principal value of the asset for estate duty but without any reduction under section 42 (1) (2) of the Finance Act 1966, and without any reduction under section 64 of the Finance Act 1960. We will call this 'V';
- (b) the aggregate of the sums within paragraphs (a) and (b) of paragraph 4 (1) of Schedule 6 to the Finance Act 1965, which would have been deductible in computing the gain on a disposal by the donee [sic] at the time of the death. We will call this 'C'.

If V exceeds C then part of the estate duty actually payable on the asset on the death can be brought into account as though it were expenditure incurred by the donee within paragraph 4 (1) (b). This part of the estate duty is the proportion which (V-C) bears to V. Thus if the estate duty is E, then the extra amount allowable in computing capital gains is produced by the formula  $E \times \frac{(V-C)}{V}$ . Here again there is no provision for allowing tax against tax, as might well be fairer; tax is allowed as a deduction in computing the subsequent gain on which capital gains tax (or corporation tax in the case of a company donee) is charged.

As indicated above, the assets within section 42 (3) are divided into three categories as follows:

- (i) owned by the donee;
- (ii) property settled by the gift;
- (iii) 'property which by virtue of section 38 (9) of the Finance Act 1957 is treated for the purposes of that section as settled by the gift'.

What section 38 (9) in fact says is that where the donee settles the gift before the donor's death, subsections (1) to (8) of section 38 'shall apply in relation to property comprised in the settlement as if the settlement had been made by the gift'.

What is the estate duty payable 'in respect of' the asset? Seeing that the estate duty will be inter vivos gift duty, which is charged on the donated property, this question will normally be much easier to answer than if duty was paid on the totality of the deceased's free estate. Nevertheless there may be some difficulty where the property is diverse and carries liability for debts.

Section 42 is retrospective to the beginning of capital gains tax and (in so far as it relates to estate duty) is to be construed as one with the Finance Act 1894. Section 42 (3) is not really concerned with estate duty as such; it expressly modifies Part III of the Finance Act 1965, which is the fasciculus of sections providing for the imposition and computation of capital gains tax.

Report on Prices

THE Board of Trade has reported this week that it has received from manufacturers about eighty requests to raise prices since the prices standstill began on July 20th, and that most of these are still under consideration. Although there have been some cases where the Government has not been consulted, particularly among the products of retail chemists, the board believes that industry is making a serious effort to co-operate in the prices freeze.

About three hundred and fifty letters have been received from the public complaining of higher charges, particularly in the case of laundries, chemists' goods, toys, greeting cards, knitting needles, footwear, records and hotel rooms. In a number of cases it was found that these were due to the 10 per cent increase in purchase tax announced in July. A report on laundry charges is due to be published this week and the Board of Trade intends to discuss its recommendations with the laundry industry.

In its attempt to hold down prices the Board has been in touch with over two hundred trade associations as well as with individual manufacturers. The Board's officials have also been in touch with the main organizations representing wholesalers and retailers, finance houses, newsagents and hotels.

During the period covered by this progress report the pressure to increase prices has not been particularly strong but is likely to intensify from now on. The selective employment tax will provide a legitimate reason for some increases but it will not always be easy to determine whether the amounts of particular increases are justified.

Productivity Bargaining

THE banning of wage increases related to productivity is one of the most controversial features of the pay freeze, and it seems virtually certain that when the absolute freeze comes to an end productivity bargaining will assume a growing importance. This was recognized by the publication last week by the Trades Union Congress of a booklet entitled Productivity Bargaining, the third in the series of T.U.C. booklets intended as a guide to negotiators. It is based on notes used in the T.U.C. training college courses.

The productivity bargain is defined as a bargain in which substantial increases in pay or improved security or both are related to precise proposals to get a more effective use of manpower or more intensive use of plant and equipment. After the management has outlined what it wants to do, the job of the union is to identify what the measures will mean to each worker individually. They may, for example, change the relative importance of certain craftsmen within the plant or disturb traditional relationships between the skilled and unskilled or between supervision and production workers. If one group of workers is adversely affected there will be a poorer chance of getting further agreement in the same plant or similar plants elsewhere.

The booklet makes the point that technological changes increase the tendency for work practices to become out of date with the result that productivity agreements will themselves need frequent review. Trade union negotiators, if they are to play their full part in reaching and subsequently developing productivity agreements, must therefore know a good deal about management techniques.

This is My Life

by An Industrious Accountant

WE have developed a practice locally which has proved of considerable benefit over the last few years. Some half-dozen of us accountants, irrespective of professional allegiance, meet informally once a month for a talk on business trends and personal problems. Usually we have dinner as well.

The basic principle is the recognition that nowadays it's nearly impossible to keep abreast in isolation of even most of the vital happenings affecting the profession. Specialism has improved but narrowed down our skills. Accurate briefing is a necessity for survival.

One of our number recently appealed for advice, so we pooled our ideas to help him. His position as chief accountant in his firm had become untenable, he explained; the previous morning his chairman had told him bluntly to look out for another job forthwith. How was he to handle his problem?

Obviously at local level he should set the grapevine in immediate motion so that his friends and business acquaintances would be aware that he was available. In addition, of course, the advertisement columns of The Accountant offered numerous targets for the job applications which he must distribute in prompt profusion. Many of them, however, required the furnishing of references.

There lay his dilemma. His chairman had offered him a glowing letter of recommendation if he resigned, but none would be available if he chose to work out his notice. How necessary was the document? In our closely-knit little community the news of his dismissal would leak out relentlessly, but it wouldn't percolate as far as prospective employers in the London area. On the other hand, if he explained to a sceptical interviewer that he had resigned a senior post of his own accord before first securing a new job as an elementary precaution, wouldn't it sound a little, well, fishy?

While we were thrashing out this six-marker, our oldest member posed a sudden query from a new angle. What about pension rights? Did resignation entail renunciation of the employee's claim to benefit, or was he eligible for anything more than the refund of his own contribution?

His firm maintained individual non-contributory endowment insurance policies, the sufferer explained, making pensions or lump sums available as appropriate for ex-employees or dependants. He would be entitled to the substantial surrender value of his own policy unless he was sacked for fraud or improper behaviour, or if he left of his own free will.

In the sudden alert silence which fell on the group he hastily asserted that these factors weren't relevant. The chairman wouldn't apply the latter clause, surely, if the accountant resigned to obtain the letter of recommendation. Well, surely he wouldn't be so mercenary? In fact the victim had been dismissed, but only for incompatibility or lack of drive - nothing worse. His resignation would be a legal fiction, surely, not a disclaimer of benefit?

Our oldest member observed with some asperity that it was high time that somebody found out definitely before the wrong beneficiary seized the surrender value. How had his solicitor advised him? Had his boss put anything in writing yet?

We terminated by deciding that several disillusioned heads were better than a single credulous one in emergency, and that legal advice was a prerequisite when the crunch came. There was no future in deferential assumptions of the good intentions of an aggressor.

Contingent Interests and Claims for Repayment of Tax

by T. J. SOPHIAN

WHERE income is accumulated under a will or a settlement for the benefit of a person 'contingently on his attaining some specified age or marrying', the beneficiary is entitled, ceteris paribus, on attaining that age or marrying under that age to repayment of tax paid on the income during the period of accumulation.

This relief is granted by section 228 of the Income Tax Act 1928, which re-enacts section 25 of the 1918 Act. In the drafting of wills or settlements that provision must always be borne in mind where contingent interests are to be conferred on beneficiaries. The Courts have construed the section very strictly, with the result that some of the decisions would appear to be somewhat anomalous and even, to some extent, contrary to the spirit of the enactment.

Quite apart from the principal rule that the section will not afford relief if there is a double contingency, there are certain other subsidiary points which have been established. Thus it is requisite that the particular age at which the beneficiary is to take a vested interest must be expressly stated, since otherwise it cannot be treated as 'specified'. It must be definite and ascertained at the outset. Accordingly, a direction that the accumulated income should be paid twenty years after the death of the testator has been held to take the case out of the benefit of the section. (White v. Whitcher (13 T.C. 202; 6 A.T.C. 910).)

And if the interest is in effect a vested and not a contingent interest, the section equally will not apply. Care obviously must be taken in drafting, since what might appear to be a contingent interest might turn out to be in effect a vested one. Thus where a donor stated in a letter addressed to the parents of the beneficiary, 'I also hand you a stock receipt representing the investment of £500 in Consols, which with the accruing dividends thereon will fall due to your youngest boy as he attains the age of 21 years', the trust was held to create a vested and not a contingent interest in the beneficiary, with the result that the case fell outside the section. (Roberts v. Hanks (10 T.C. 351; 5 A.T.C. 179).)

On the other hand, if the interest is contingent it is not necessary that the beneficiary should have an absolute interest in the trust capital or in the accumulation of income, on attaining the age or marrying. Thus if the accumulated income is added to the trust capital, and the beneficiary then, on attaining the age or marrying, has merely a life interest in the trust capital, the case will fall within the section and the relief can be claimed. (Dale v. Mitchell ([1928] 1 K.B. 383).)

Accumulation to be for beneficiary's exclusive benefit

Again it is necessary that the accumulation must be for the exclusive benefit of the particular beneficiary. The case of C.I.R. v. Maude-Roxby (31 T.C. 388; 29 A.T.C. 271) affords a good example.

There the settlor in September 1927 transferred certain stocks to trustees in trust for the benefit of his three children in equal shares. The trust directed that, subject to a power to apply the whole or part of the income of each child's share for her maintenance, education and advancement, the trustees were to accumulate the income of each share with the capital thereof. On each child attaining the age of 25, the trustees were to pay over to her the income of her share of the trust funds and accumulations subject, however, to an absolute discretion in the trustees to restrict at any time the income of the child to such smaller sum as the trustees in their absolute discretion should consider proper, and to accumulate the balance or apply it for the benefit of certain other persons.

The respondent attained the age of 25 in April 1940 and claimed repayment of the tax on the income accumulated since the date of the settlement in September 1927 down to April 1940. The Scottish Court of Session held that the accumulations were not necessarily for the exclusive benefit of the beneficiary and that the relief could not be granted.

The Court, after referring to the cases of C.I.R. v. Bone and others (13 T.C. 20; 6 A.T.C. 670) and Dain v. Miller (18 T.C. 478; 13 A.T.C. 25), considered that the provision in section 25 (1) of the 1918 Act should be construed and be read as follows:

'Where in pursuance of the provisions of any will or settlement any income arising from any fund is accumulated for the [exclusive] benefit of any person contingently [only] on his attaining some specified age or marrying....'

In the view of the Court the gift was, in effect, a gift of so much of the income as the trustees at any time and from time to time decided to pay to the respondent, coupled with a gift of the balance, if any, to third persons.

The right to the income, furthermore, was not dependent only on the beneficiary attaining the age of 25 or marrying. It was dependent also on the omission of the trustees to exercise their discretion and to reduce, or even abrogate entirely, the payment of the income to the respondent.

It is arguable, however, on the authority of Chamberlain v. Haig Thomas (17 T.C. 595; 13 A.T.C. 54) that the case was not one of a double contingency, and that the right to the repayment could not have been refused on that ground (i.e. double contingency), though the point was taken by the Revenue. And indeed there was some doubt in Lord Keith's mind that the case was one of a double contingency. The real basis of the decision was the non-exclusiveness of the benefit.

As Lord Keith said in his judgment:

'It was accumulated for the benefit of the respondent or any other person within the class designated by the (settlor), being the husband or children or sister of the respondent or grandchildren of the (settlor), in the event of the trustees deciding to exercise the power of restriction conferred upon them. When the income was being accumulated it was not possible to say for whom it was being accumulated, because the trustees could not know whether, even if the respondent attained the age of 25, or married, they might not restrict her share of income.'

The fact that the respondent had attained the age of 25 and was enjoying the income was considered by the Court to be irrelevant.

The case of Bone (supra) was referred to in Maude-Roxby (supra). Bone was a clear case of a double contingency since one of the conditions of the vesting was the survivorship of the mother, which was in addition to the attainment of the specified age.

Effect of discretionary powers

The conferring of discretionary powers on trustees or others to vary the amount of the shares of beneficiaries does not necessarily debar a beneficiary contingently entitled on attaining a specified age or marrying from obtaining relief under section 228, though the greatest care is necessary in drafting the particular settlement to steer clear of the section. The classic case is Chamberlain v. Haig Thomas (supra).

In Chamberlain v. Haig Thomas the trusts were to the mother for life, and after her death the trustees were to stand possessed of the stock and other trust funds and the income thereof for all or such one or more exclusively of the other or others of the issue (whether children or more remote) of the marriage at such times, in such shares and generally in such manner as the respondent's parents should jointly appoint, and in default of such appointment in trust for all the children of the marriage, who being sons should attain the age of 21 years or being daughters should attain that age or marry under that age, in equal shares.

On February 18th, 1913, the mother died but no appointment had been made and the whole income was accumulated until 1922 when the husband irrevocably appointed that the trustees should hold the fund and the income thereof in trust for the absolute benefit of his three children, including the respondent, all of whom were then infants, in equal shares.

In December 1929, the respondent became of age and made a claim under section 25 of the Income Tax Act 1918, the claim being for accumulations during the period from the date of the mother's death on February 18th, 1913, to the date of the appointment on December 5th, 1922, while the respondent was still an infant. It will be noted therefore that the appointment was made while the respondent was still an infant, and that no claim was made for accumulations during the remainder of the period of the respondent's infancy (which ended on December 1st, 1929), falling after the date of the appointment on December 6th, 1922. In fact, Finlay, J., as he then was, was at pains to point out that the claim was not in respect of the whole period until the beneficiary attained 21, but was confined to the period between the date of the mother's death and the date of the appointment by the father.

Existence of power not per se a bar

The Court held that the income accumulated, during the period of the non-exercise of the power was within the protection of the section, and that the beneficiary was entitled to relief in respect of such accumulations of the income. In his judgment, Finlay, J., stated:

'It was during those years being accumulated because there was a direction in the settlement requiring that, not in the absence of any power of appointment but in the absence of any exercise of the appointment, the income was to be accumulated for the person contingently on his attaining 21 years. The existence of the power cannot prevent the money during the years alone, which are in question, from having been accumulated and having been accumulated under the direction for accumulation. After the exercise of the power no doubt the position is different and I was not asked to consider and I have not to consider the position then.'

With regard to the income accumulated after the exercise of the appointment, on December 6th, 1922, whereby the trustees were to hold the fund and the income thereof in trust for the absolute benefit of all the three infant children in equal shares, it would appear that the section would not have applied to that income since, it is arguable, the interests were thereby vested in the children absolutely and no contingency was subsisting any longer.

It will be observed, of course, that in Chamberlain v. Haig Thomas the primary trust gave the children the contingent interests in equal shares, so that in default of any exercise of their powers of appointment by the trustees, those interests would subsist and automatically vest on majority or marriage as the case might be. It was a case of contingent interests subject to defeasance. It would seem to be otherwise therefore where the contingent interests could not become vested without the exercise of the power of appointment, as where the trust was a purely discretionary trust, which would require the performance of some act by way of a condition precedent to the vesting, such as the exercise of a power of appointment.

Effect of exercise of power during minority

To take a further set of circumstances. Assuming that the trust is purely discretionary in the sense above indicated and that the power of appointment is exercised so as to finalize the respective shares of the beneficiaries in the trust capital and income and accumulations, would the section extend to the income being accumulated after the determination and fixing of the shares, assuming of course that the interest of the beneficiaries were contingent on attaining a specified age or marriage?

It would appear that the relief could then be claimed in respect of the income being accumulated after such exercise of the power, even though it could not have been claimed in respect of the accumulations prior to such exercise. The test, it is submitted, is as follows:

Considering the particular accumulations, can it be said at any point of time that the accumulations are for the exclusive benefit of the particular beneficiary, contingently on attaining a specified age or marriage?

If the accumulations satisfy this test, the point of time at which the test is satisfied is immaterial. It is not necessary that this test should be satisfied at the very outset of the creation of the settlement and the trusts. Although the income during a particular period of accumulation may be subject to a double contingency, once the offending contingency was removed, e.g. by the exercise of such a power as above mentioned, the subsequent accumulations of income would be free from any such objection and would accordingly, ceteris paribus rank for relief under the section on the beneficiary attaining the specified age or marrying, as the case might be.

Reference finally may be made to the most recently reported case of Lynch v. Davies (40 T.C. 511; 41 A.T.C. 351) in which the taxpayer successfully contended that the trusts fell within the protection of section 228.

In that case the trusts of the settlement which was made on January 29th, 1951, were for the settlor's two daughters who should attain the age of 21. The shares of the children, however, were not to vest absolutely, and the income of each child's share was to be paid to her during her life, but this interest was to be defeasible in certain events, and was then to be held on discretionary trusts, for her, her husband, and certain other persons. Further, so long as a child of the settlor was under 25, the trustees had a discretionary power to apply the whole or part of the income of her share of the settlement funds for her maintenance etc. and to accumulate the surplus during the settlor's lifetime for the benefit of the persons who should eventually become entitled to the principal fund, with power to apply accumulations in the same way as current income. Further the trustees had the power with the settlor's consent to pay to any child the whole or part of her share of the settlement funds.

During the appellant's minority, the trustees accumulated the whole of the income. The appellant came of age on September 22nd, 1956, and in April 1957 the trustees paid over to her one-half of the income accumulated during her minority (i.e. until 21 years of age, not 25 years). The appellant claimed repayment of the tax on such one-half of the income, under section 228. The main question for determination was whether that income had been accumulated for her benefit contingently on her attaining a specified age, viz. 21.

Basis of decision in Lynch v. Davies

The point in substance taken by the Revenue was that the case was one of a double contingency. The income was to be accumulated during the settlor's lifetime, notwithstanding that the child had attained the age of 21, so that the child would not necessarily receive the accumulations on attaining 25. Further, the interest of the beneficiary would in certain circumstances be defeasible, and her interest might therefore determine, if those events occurred, before she reached the age of 25, so that the additional and double contingency consisted of the non-occurrence of any such event.

The Court held that the income arising from the re-investment of accumulations was, after the attaining of the age of 25 by the child, to be held on the same trusts as the income of the principal fund and was therefore (subject to the terms of the protective trusts) payable to such child, so that accumulations were made for the benefit of the child contingently upon her attaining the age of 25. The Court further held that the protective trust, comprising a protected life interest and supplementary trusts, formed one whole and was for the benefit of the appellant.

Commenting briefly on this decision, might it not be said that this case applies the principle in Chamberlain v. Haig Thomas? There was a clear trust contingent on the child attaining the age of 21, defeasible in certain events which did not happen, so that the interest and the accumulations, contingent on the child attaining 21, and on which basis the claim for repayment was in fact made, was not affected during the non-happening of those events, in much the same way as the interest and the accumulations in Chamberlain v. Haig Thomas were not affected during, and because of the non-exercise of the power of appointment, in relation, inter alia, to the selection of the beneficiaries and the fixing of the shares.

The Financial Function in Business

by M. GORDON WRIGHT, B.Com., A.A.C.C.A., F.C.C.S.
Lecturer, The Polytechnic School of Management Studies

PRESENT pressures for education and change in the field of management are likely to become even more severe as Britain goes through its period of economic trial. Changes there must be – not least changes in attitude – in the way in which a management approaches its task of making the business it controls into an economically viable, progressive unit, capable of surmounting economic and structural change and achieving the due rewards for its employees and shareholders and making a contribution to the economic stability of the country.

The need is there, and it is urgent. Facilities for education and training for management are being built up rapidly, both by professional bodies and in the field of higher education. Many companies have shown that they recognize the need by contributing large sums for business education, both externally and within their own organizations. What is required now is a clear understanding of the aims of this movement and what it must achieve if it is to be successful.

It is in the field of finance that probably the greatest changes of all are required. For too long finance has been thought of pre-eminently as book-keeping and taxation, and the methods of training entrants to the accountancy profession have done little to dispel that attitude. But now above all must be the time for a fundamental reappraisal of what the finance function of the business is about and how it plays a part in management.

The finance function broadly has four major purposes:

- (a) Raising funds for use in the business. – This involves the basic relationships between shareholders' funds and borrowed funds (both short- and long-term).
- (b) Allocation of funds within the business. – This will be tied up with the general management appraisal of the objectives of the company and the methods by which those objectives are to be achieved, as well as the more specific allocations to individual projects within that general pattern.
- (c) Control of effective use of resources. – Basically an analytical and reporting system, the keystone of which is return on capital employed followed by detailed analysis of factors affecting that return.

- (d) Data processing. – The recording part of the financial function including financial and cost accounting and other data provision.

Planning

The most vital of these four functions as far as the long-term prosperity of the business is concerned is the allocation of funds within the business, because this relates to the central core of management and hinges on what should be management's prime purpose; that is, the identification of the objectives of the business or, as it is often called, its 'corporate strategy'.

This involves the identification of the prime function of the business. This may not be so simple as it sounds, and failure here may be the reason why many companies today are loss-making or of low profitability. In Cunard, for example, one gets the impression (at least until recently) that the principal objective of the company is running a prestige fleet of passenger liners. But is this really true? Is not the real purpose of the company the provision of transportation facilities at the right price for the demands of today, irrespective of the means of transportation used? Contrast this with Canadian Pacific Railways which has expanded into all means of transport to provide an all-embracing transportation service.

The analysis of the company's objectives should go even more deeply than identification of the particular commodities or services it provides. The Coca-Cola company manufactures and sells a beverage, but the company's striking success is due not so much to its success in manufacturing the essence from which its drinks are made, or as a bottling company, but rather to its particular expertise in marketing – both at home and overseas. The principal business objective here is more than provision of refreshment, it is the development of that particular marketing expertise which has made it successful.

Recognition that a business's central objective may be no longer valid is also necessary, unless the business's particular expertise can be carried over into new fields through technological change. A striking illustration of this is Beyer Peacock whose traditional expertise was in locomotive building. The company failed to recognize that its objective ceased to exist several years ago and tried to carry over management to non-traditional fields with a startling lack of success through a policy of diversification. The report in the 1965 accounts for this company should be a dire warning to those who think diversification is the panacea for lack of a company objective, for in the process the shareholders have seen a large proportion of their funds melt away in a flood of losses.

Though I have dealt at some length with this topic, which strictly is not the province of the finance function, I make no apologies for this. Failure in this recognition of what is the basic purpose of the business, cannot be rectified by otherwise good management – it can only be mitigated.

The reason why this decision by management is important for the finance function is that when the objectives of the business have been identified, the funds available to the company should be allocated overall in such a way as to facilitate the optimum achievement of those objectives. This is not to decry specific techniques for allocating resources, such as discounted cash flow (D.C.F.), but rather to say that there should be a two-level allocation of funds, i.e.:

- (i) a global allocation in line with the fulfilment of businesses objectives;
- (ii) within that global allocation, an allocation of funds to specific projects in the more traditional way.

This distinction is important and should be clearly appreciated. The global allocation of funds will be made at board level with the long-term strategy of the company in mind. Proposals for specific allocation of funds for projects usually originate some way down the chain of management, by people who in all probability are not aware of the company's strategy and therefore allocation of funds on such a basis may not result in the company's objectives being achieved.

The more specific allocation of funds within the business will devolve on a number of forecasting techniques. With new capital projects the investment of funds will depend upon the comparative rates of return that can be earned on the new investment using the D.C.F. technique that enables projects to be ranked in order of profitability. Allocations to existing areas of operations will depend upon the preparation of operating budgets and cash budgets for each area. Within the general allocation of funds such methods will allow for funds to be allocated in such a way as to achieve the maximum profitability.

Control of effective use of resources

The prime measurement of the efficiency with which a business uses its funds is the return on capital employed. 'Capital employed' here being defined as the long-term funds (both borrowed and shareholders') used in the business, which is also equivalent to total assets less current liabilities. Until recently the usual definition of return on capital employed has been the before-tax profits attributable to the capital employed, now that there is the corporation tax which is solely chargeable on the company as such, we should fall in with American practice and calculate the return after tax, treating corporation tax as one more expense in operating the business. This is logical since it is only out of after-tax profits that funds are available to the business for paying dividends and expansion through ploughed-back profits.

Return on capital employed is the product of two basic functions in the business: (a) percentage profit to sales; and (b) turnover of capital employed. If, for example, the relevant data for a particular business are as follows:

Sales .. .. .	12,000,000
Capital employed .. ..	6,000,000
After-tax profit .. ..	600,000

Then:

Return on capital employed=

$$\frac{600,000}{6,000,000} \times 100 = 10 \text{ per cent}$$

Percentage profit on sales=

$$\frac{600,000}{12,000,000} \times 100 = 5 \text{ per cent}$$

Turnover of capital employed=

$$\frac{12,000,000}{6,000,000} = 2 \text{ times per year}$$

From this can readily be seen the relationship between these three ratios since the 10 per cent return on capital employed is the product of the other two ratios.

The analysis of profitability can then be carried further down the line to ascertain the factors which have affected the profit/sales ratio and the turnover of capital employed ratio. The first of these leads naturally to a percentage analysis of the profit and loss account to ascertain those factors in that account which have affected the percentage profit. This means that for each year being used in the comparison, all individual items in the profit and loss account are expressed as percentages of the sales for that year. Movements in these percentages will then indicate items which have moved at a greater rate than sales. Further analysis beyond the profit and loss account can also be made of cost/volume relationships by break-even analysis and marginal analysis of costs to isolate fundamental trends in the business which affect profitability to sales.

Factors which affect the turnover of capital employed will be the volume of funds tied up in various assets in the balance sheet. In most businesses, funds will be locked up in three principal assets – fixed assets, stock and debtors. If the management can control these three items then it can influence this ratio to a large extent. In the case of fixed assets, because of their long-term nature, the point of control should be before the investment in that asset is made. This will involve some method of appraisal (preferably D.C.F.) of each new project before it is made, and either the ranking of projects in order of profitability and selecting the most profitable, or the meeting of certain minimal criteria.

In the case of stock, the objective should be to ensure that the number of times stock is turned over in a year is above a minimum level. This is not to say, of course, that further research should not be made to establish more precise minimum levels of turnover by use of mathematical techniques for setting stock levels.

The level of debtors is a product of the level of sales and the credit period allowed, and a simple expression of the debt ratio is the number of days' sales tied up in debtors. British companies – with some notable exceptions – tend to let this figure drift without real control. A realistic credit period should be allowed which is as short as possible without seriously interfering with sales, and when that period has been established there should be an automatic system for following up overdue accounts until they are collected. As an overall management control a brief report each month showing the number of days' sales outstanding as debtors is quite effective since it quickly reveals any adverse trend in debtors and at the same time relates the number of days to the firm's credit terms. Quite small changes in the debt ratio can absorb a substantial amount of funds.

From the above it can be seen that there is a pattern for analysing the profitability of a business as shown in Fig. 1 below.

Provision of funds

This function of financial management involves a fundamental appraisal of the relationship between board and shareholders. Whilst the allocation and control of funds employed in the business is essentially designed to maximize the return on all long-term funds employed, the way in which those funds are raised will essentially be related to their effect on shareholders, both in the short-term return on shareholders' funds and the long-term maximization of equity values.

The three factors that must be considered in reaching the right combination of funds employed are return, risk and control; and the duty of management should always be to balance these factors so as to provide the equity holders with the maximum return on their funds commensurate with the risks involved.

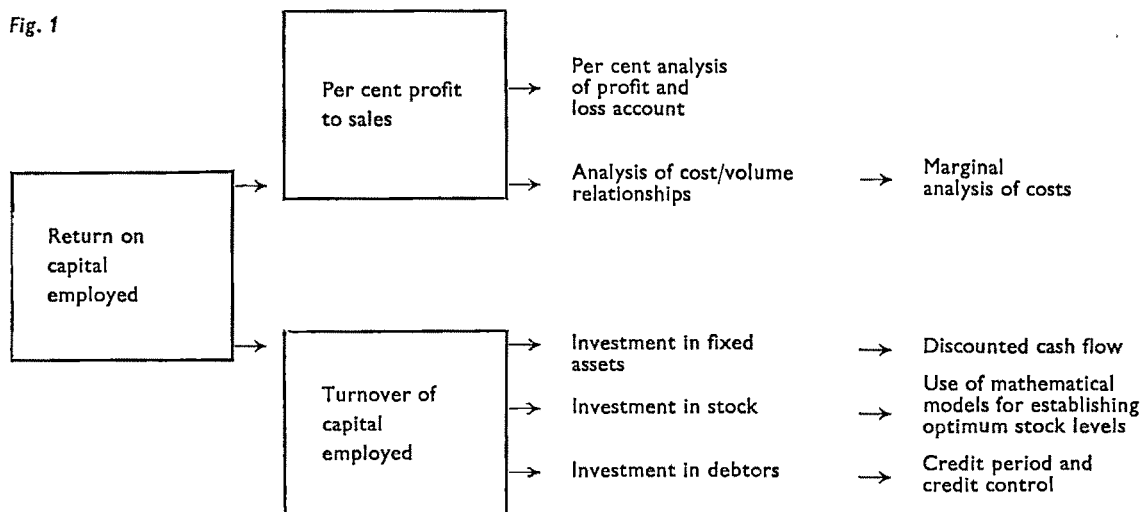

The return factor is a function of 'gearing', as it is called in Britain, and 'leverage' in the United States. Gearing is essentially the combination of fixed dividend and fixed interest funds with equity funds to increase the return on the latter. This will be achieved as long as the fixed dividend or interest payable on those funds is lower than the return on capital employed, since the excess of the return over fixed dividends or interest will revert to the equity holders and increase their return.

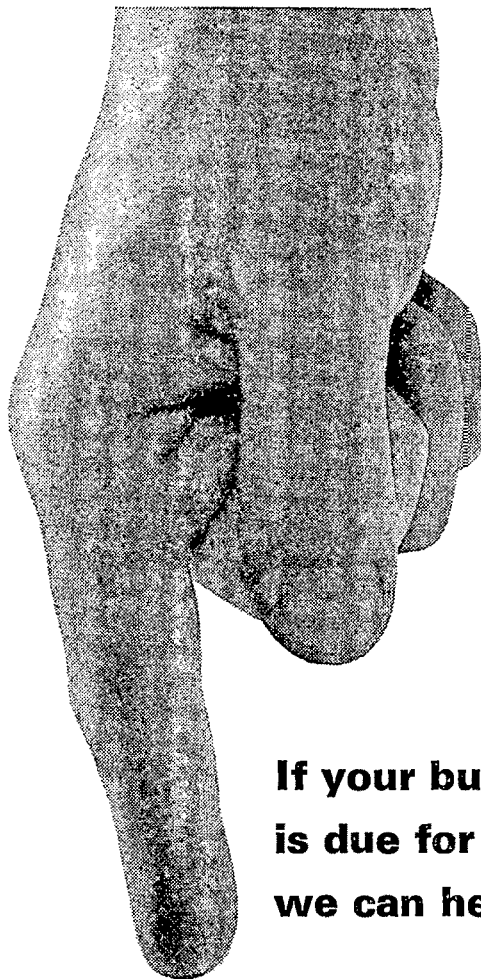

As an illustration of gearing, assume that one is setting up a new company whose capital employed will be £100,000 and the expected profits to be £15,000 p.a. (tax is ignored at this stage). The company can raise all its funds by an issue of ordinary shares or by a combination of funds. What benefit is there in the latter? An example of the two methods is shown in Fig. 2.

As can be seen from the example, gearing can increase the return as long as it can earn more on the funds it uses than it has to pay for the use of these funds. Moreover, the change to corporation tax has further accentuated the effects of gearing as far as loans and debentures are concerned, since the interest on such funds is a charge on profits before tax, whereas dividends now cost the company the gross amount and they are paid out of after-tax profits.

What are the practical limits to gearing? The introduction of borrowing into the capital structure of the business imposes contractual obligations for the payment of interest and the repayment of the capital sum on the due date. No such obligation rests on equity issues. Gearing will therefore increase the risks to the company and the equity holders, since another class of

with an excellent growth record plus trustee stability

Intrust Fund is a unit trust investing in about 150 first-class companies both here and overseas with excellent prospects of capital growth. But the investments are also chosen for their stability and to meet the needs of trustees and other responsible investors.

Record of Growth

In the 4½ years to the 16th August 1966 since the Fund was started the share price had risen by 13% compared with a rise of 4% in the Financial Times Ordinary Share Index.

At the same time income had risen by 30%.

Current estimated gross yield on £100 invested on August 16th was £5.8s.0d.%.

Moderate Charges

Charges have been kept low—an initial charge of 3¼% (rounded up to the nearest ¼d.) plus a yearly charge of 5/- per £100 of the average value of the Fund.

There is a sliding scale which reduces charges progressively for sums from £10,000 to over £100,000.

Management of Proved Ability

The Unicorn Group was the pioneer of the post-war Unit Trust revival. Today, it is one of the most experienced in the Unit Trust field with over £46,000,000 of Unit Trust funds managed on behalf of 200,000 investors.

The Trustee is Royal Exchange Assurance

The Trustee to the Fund is Royal Exchange Assurance who were also joint founders with Unicorn Securities Ltd. and use the Fund as a suitable medium of investment for certain of the trusts for which they are trustee. Intrust Fund is a Wider-Range investment under the 1961 Trustee Investments Act. In addition the apportionment between capital and income is maintained in accordance with trust law.

people will now have prior rights to funds generated by the business and the ordinary shareholders' claims are subordinated to the claims of these other people. Moreover as new tranches of borrowing are introduced to the capital structure, the new borrowing may well rank behind previous borrowing and therefore bear more risk for the lender. So a point will be reached where the potential gains from further gearing may be matched by the increased risks that will be incurred, and at this point there will be an equilibrium between equity and borrowed funds.

In Britain there had been the tendency to borrow funds only where there appeared to be a necessity for it. Professor Donaldson in the United States, however, has pointed the way to using borrowed funds as part of the overall financial planning.<sup>1</sup> The principle underlying this philosophy is that the real risk attached to borrowing is that the business may go through a period of recession and be unable to meet its commitments. If one measures the effect of a period of recession on cash flows, one can determine the minimum cash flow that will be available. The company may have some outgoings which it considers necessary to maintain, e.g. a specific rate of dividend. The balance of cash flow after such payments can then be used to measure the maximum amount of debt that can be serviced and the company will, as a matter of policy, raise its borrowing to that level. This recessionary analysis is becoming quite popular in the U.S.A. and deserves serious consideration in Britain.

Further issues of equity may disturb the balance of voting control of the company and therefore possible effects in this direction must always be borne in mind.

Quite apart from the question of gearing, the management must also decide upon a policy with regard to the proportion of the company's profits recommended to be paid to shareholders. In reaching such a decision the directors will have to bear in mind a number of factors and decide upon a policy that will incorporate the right balance between these factors.

One important factor is the requirement of the business for funds for future expansion. With smaller non-quoted companies this factor may be of decisive importance since the business may have only limited access to sources of finance outside the company and therefore must rely almost entirely on retained profits for expansion. Unfortunately this is just the type of company hit by the close company provisions of the Finance Act 1965 and it is to be hoped that the 60 per cent distribution rule will be applied sympathetically.

Apart, however, from the problem of retention, the management should carefully consider the effects of their policy on the shareholders. After all, the shareholders are the owners of the business and it is right that management should always bear in mind what their long-term policy should be to shareholders, and this should be to combine a balance between maximizing short- and long-term income prospects combined with the maximum sustainable growth.

In the United Kingdom share prices are still governed to a large extent by dividend yields, rather than the earnings yield basis that is more common in the U.S.A. This position may change, but until it does it is important that management appreciate the short-term implications of dividend policy. Unjustifiable cuts in dividend rates may have a serious effect on shareholders who are obliged for one reason or another to liquidate their holdings in the short term. Shareholders in Courtaulds who sold their holdings after the cut in dividend just prior to the Imperial Chemical Industries' bid, have real grounds for discontent since the apparent standing of the company after the dividend cut was quite different from its real standing as emerged from the bid battle that followed. Directors therefore have a duty to maintain the right balance between short- and long-term prospects for shareholders and to pursue a dividend policy which is comprehensible to the investing public as a whole.

Data processing

Data processing refers basically to the more traditional end of the finance function. A business is still required to keep proper records of its transactions and most businesses will need some form of cost accounting to control manufacturing operations. Whilst the requirements of such systems remain unaltered, serious thought should be given to the purposes for which such data should be used in the business so that the way in which data are analysed and collated will produce a range of information that can be used by management in its control of the business.

Indeed, if the finance function is to play its full part in providing a service to management, the processing of data must be constructively arranged in such a way as to provide the precise information management requires for decision taking – in the form that management can use with a proper understanding of the behaviour of costs under different conditions. While the normal costing system will still be used as an instrument of control of operations, such costs are often not relevant to particular problems under consideration. Here the finance function should be developing systems of cost analysis along the line of marginal or differential costs suitable for solving typical business problems, e.g. make or buy, adding or dropping products, cost/price relationships in marginal conditions. At the same time an analysis of cost/price/volume relations such as that used in break-even analysis should become normal practice in financial reporting.

A schematic outline of the finance function as conceived in this article is given in the accompanying diagram. What is needed now is a fundamental re-appraisal of the part finance should play in the management of a business, and it must be emphasized that its functions are just as appropriate to the small company as to the larger concern.

When this conception of the finance function has been really accepted, then efforts should be made further to disseminate those analytical techniques that are already established, and to develop new techniques and improve existing ones so that finance can make a positive contribution to the improvement of management in the United Kingdom.

SOUTH AFRICA

Harsh Budget Measures

EXTENSIVE proposals, leaving hardly a sector of the South African economy untouched, were contained in the South African Budget presented to Parliament last month by the Minister of Finance. Designed to help the Government in its fight against inflation, the proposals are coupled with the monetary moves taken in July, when Bank rate was increased and steps were taken to peg basic food prices and rents.

To meet a deficit of R.53,700,000, proposed taxation increases include extra duty on beer, whisky, gin, brandy and similar spirits, minerals and soft drinks, cigarettes, cigars, tobacco and petrol and diesel oil. The excise duty on motor-cars will also be increased as well as that on luxury goods or locally produced goods such as carpets, toys, electric lamps, domestic refrigerators, washing machines and electric cookers. Even kafir-corn malt, the basis of marewu, the beer which is a staple food of the Bantu, is to be increased one cent a pound in duty.

So far as the taxpayer is concerned, the 5 per cent discount on individual income tax is to be withdrawn with effect from October 1st. This means that for the remaining six months of the tax year ending February 28th next, the taxpayer will be paying something in the region of a 10 per cent increase to make good the loss of the discount for the whole of the tax year. The 5 per cent loan levy on taxpayers and on companies, other than gold mining companies, is to be continued.

Companies tax has been increased from 30 to 33½ per cent, with the 5 per cent surcharge falling away, although the loan levy remains. Gold mining companies will have to pay a 5 per cent surcharge as will diamond mining companies. As the existing 5 per cent surcharge on the latter class of company has not been relaxed, the effect is that they will pay a 10 per cent surcharge. Non-resident shareholders tax on dividends paid has been increased from 7½ per cent to 10 per cent.

Another step to 'cool down' the economy is a proposal to introduce the necessary legislation to compel insurance companies, pension funds, unit trust schemes and similar institutions having fairly ample funds for investment to hold a certain amount of their funds in Government stocks. Similarly, insurers (including Lloyd's) and pension funds, which are at present required to hold some portion of their funds in the form of gilt-edged and semi-gilt securities, to hold only Government securities. Increases in Post Office Savings Bank rates and the raising of the ceiling for 'tax-free' interest were also announced.

Earlier in the month, the Minister of Railways and Harbours in presenting his Budget statement for 1966-67 announced a deficit of R.13,900,000 for the 1965-66 financial year and budgeted for a further heavy deficit of R.37 million in the coming financial year, which has only another six months to run.

To meet this staggering shortfall, the Minister announced his intention to increase rates by 10 per cent to 15 per cent on an all-round basis. Thus, passenger fares will be increased by 15 per cent and 20 per cent on main and suburban lines, first and second class fares, and by an all-over 10 per cent on third-class fares. Goods rates, too, are to undergo revision and increase, with certain selected competitive or otherwise preferential tariffs being completely abolished. The net revenue expected from all tariff adjustments will amount to R.46,300,000 in a full year.

Such heavy increases in rail rates, in a country which relies heavily on its railways for transport and where all rail transport is a State monopoly, can only have a resounding effect on all sections of the economy, at a time when the Government is doing all in its power to cope with the spiralling cost of living.

Accountants' New Headquarters at Düsseldorf

THE recent opening and dedication of the new headquarters of the Institut der Wirtschaftsprüfer in Düsseldorf was attended by a large number of members and representatives of other professional bodies. The building is constructed so that all the activities, including publishing and a bookshop, are housed under one roof. Modern building techniques such as movable partitioning walls, enable space to be adapted to practical needs.

The chairman of the executive committee, Dr Schwarz, said in the course of his speech that the word 'dedication' embodied an idea that had survived the centuries. It recalled the need for blessing, for healing, not only of men and all creation but also of things. Records, furniture, buildings often outlast the short-lived generations of mankind, he added, and they help history to show that the individual is only a small vanishing link in the long chain of humanity. 'May this house endure, may the work which is done in it succeed and be for the happiness and prosperity of our people and our country'.

Further celebrations took place on the following day when the Institute entertained the Presidents and Councils of other professional bodies and representatives of Government departments. Dr Baetzgen, of the Federal Ministry of Economic Affairs, said he brought the good wishes of the Ministry with particular pleasure because for decades past it had worked closely with accountants. The work and professional ability of accountants was particularly valuable because they helped to increase productive capacity and gave a guarantee of efficiency in the sphere of accounting.

Professor Dr Gessler, of the Federal Ministry of Justice, spoke of the closeness of the connections between the legal and accountancy professions. The company law of 1931, which imposed the legal duty of auditing, had been the cradle of accountancy and the profession had grown up around this task. Accountants had been called the link between economics and law, but it might have been nearer the truth to call them trustees of the economy. They had been described as 'disinterested guardians of company interests, intermediaries between the interests of management on the one hand and shareholders on the other', and from the beginning their fiduciary capacity had been the mainspring of their profession. The dedication of the new quarters, he said, had almost coincided with the coming into force of the new company law, which brought changes in the work of accountants and made them to an even greater extent the links between law and economics and trustees of management and shareholders.

North American Visitors

AN illustration of the extent to which New Zealand benefits from contact with the developments of accountancy education overseas is provided by the current visit to New Zealand universities of two eminent American educationists.

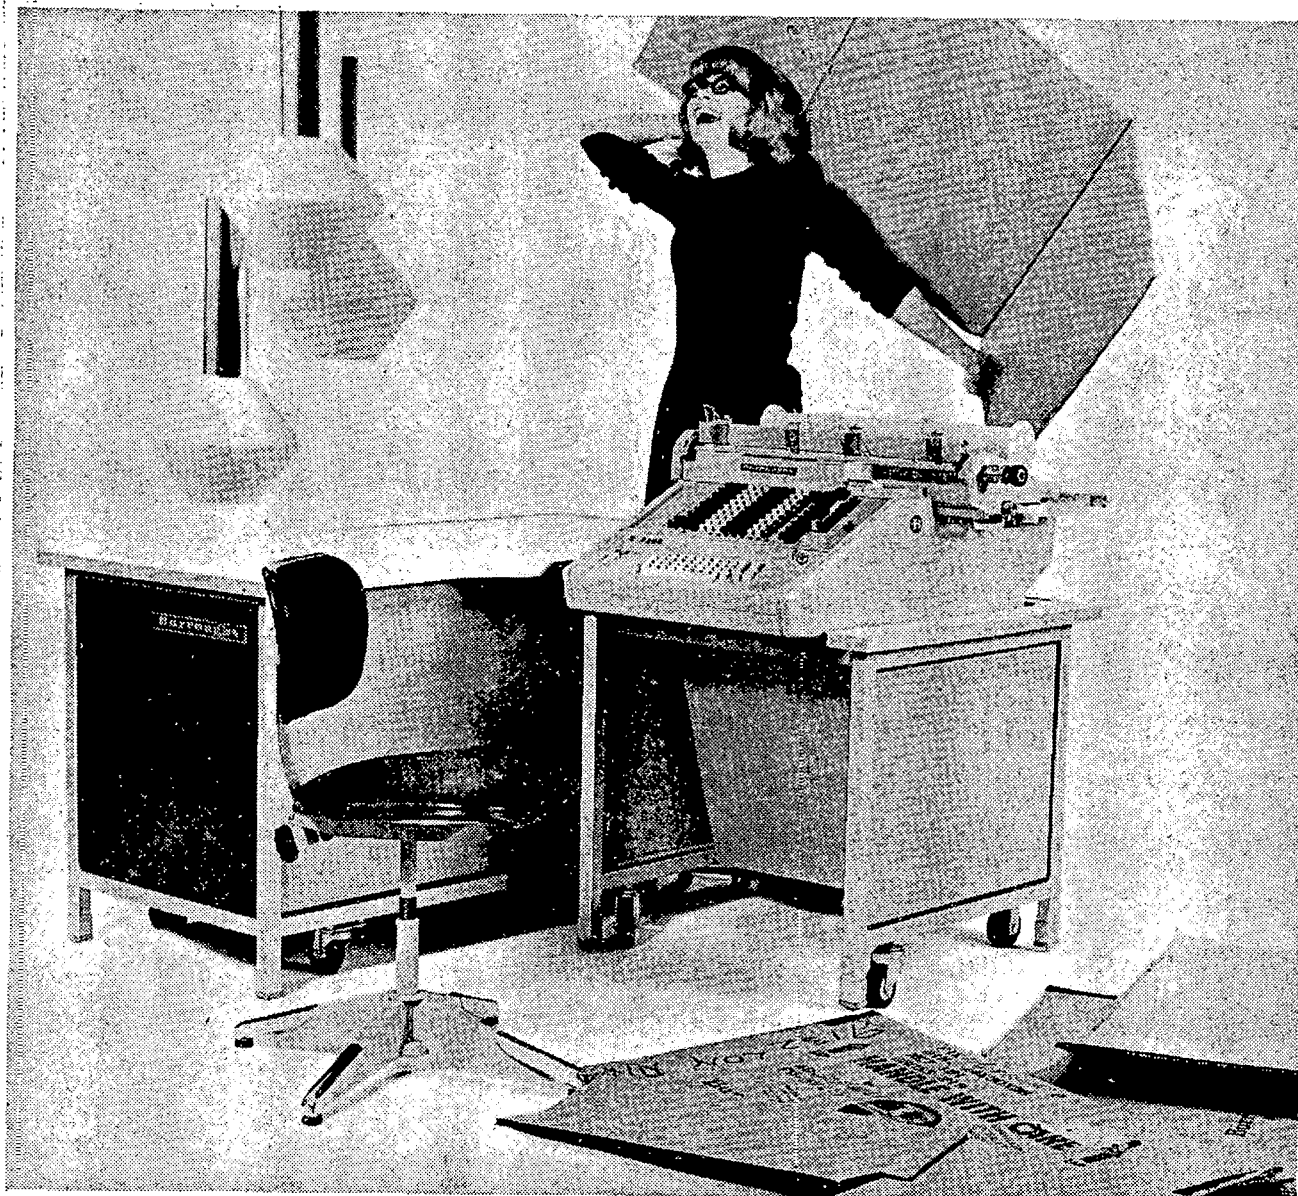

Professor H. R. Anton, Head of the Field of Accounting at the University of California, Berkeley, is spending two months at Victoria University of Wellington. Apart from his university lectures, Professor Anton is addressing the Operations Research Society and the Wellington Branch of the New Zealand Society of Accountants, as well as participating in the annual advanced accounting seminar of Victoria University of Wellington.

The second visitor is Professor R. S. Wasley, Head of the Division of Accounting at the School of Business Administration at the University of Colorado, who is spending several months at the University of Canterbury. During his stay Professor Wasley is undertaking a research project on the application of American management accounting techniques to New Zealand conditions.

Poverty in Accounting Thought?

IN a thought-provoking article in the July issue of The Journal of Accountancy, Mr Herman W. Bevis, C.P.A., senior partner of Messrs Price, Waterhouse & Co, warns that comparability is not necessarily obtained by uniformity of accounting treatment, regardless of circumstances. He takes as an example the rule of provision for deferred taxes, where income reported to shareholders is understated for tax purposes. By this rule, he says, the profession has, in effect, created and levied a supplementary 'income tax' of its own. While Company A may be likely to have to pay the deferred tax in the near future, Company B may have the possibility of payment only as a remote contingency, being a large, stable company with thousands of items which have given rise to the tax reduction. Yet he says that the Securities and Exchange Commission has recently decreed that deferred income taxes related to Another example put forward is the uniform rule which has forbidden adjustment of financial statements for changes in the price level, with the result that research, experimentation and development, at the individual company level, have been effectively banned. Poverty in accounting thought has resulted from this rule against change – presumably, adds Mr Bevis, until everybody changes over and starts making adjustments at the same time. He believes that the gap between academic researchers and practising members of the accounting profession is bigger than in any other profession, including law, medicine, and engineering. A DEGREE of consternation is said to have resulted from a revision of the old industrial production index which shows that the output of Canadian industry is some 10 per cent greater than was formerly realized. One of the less satisfactory interpretations of the new figures is, says a report in Canadian Business for July, that corporate profits have only kept pace with production during the past ten years, and are now becoming even less favourable.

Land Commission Bill

Minister's Reply to Institute Memorandum

The Minister of Land and Natural Resources has sent the following reply to the memorandum of the Council of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales commenting on certain matters arising from consideration of the Land Commission Bill (the memorandum was published in The Accountant of August 13th).

Sir Henry Benson, C.B.E., F.C.A.

President,

The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales.

Dear Sir Henry,

Thank you for your letter of July 25th enclosing the comments of your Institute on the Land Commission Bill.

The first point that you raise has already been discussed in Standing Committee in the House of Commons and the procedure in the Bill accepted. It is, in fact, based upon the normal procedure applying to the assessment of tax. It is not intended that the Commission should automatically serve a notice of nil assessment in every case which is notified to them. A large number of transactions must be notified for stamp duty purposes and in order to simplify the procedure for the individual this notification and submission of information under section 28 of the Finance Act 1931 will suffice also for the Land Commission. It is likely, however, that a liability for levy will arise in only 10 or 15 per cent of these cases. The Commission will, in practice, ask vendors who, prima facie, will have a liability for levy, for the additional information necessary for an assessment within a few weeks after receiving the notification. It will, of course, always be open to any individual who is in doubt to write to the Commission specifically and to ask.

On the second point, interest payments due to the Commission will be payable gross but are subject to the same tax allowances as any other payment of interest on debts.

On the third point it is intended that, after the appointed day for the betterment levy, long-term capital gains tax and corporation tax on capital gains will bite only on changes in current use value, leaving betterment levy to operate on increases in development value. However, the allowances in paragraph 4 (2) of the Sixth Schedule to the Finance Act 1965 will continue to be taken into account under the provisions of that Act. If they were also to be set off against betterment levy the allowance would be duplicated. This point also was debated in Standing Committee.

For the reasons that I have explained above, capital gains tax will cease to operate on market values and your point about identity of the figure used for levy and for tax does not therefore arise.

On the point that you make in paragraph 5, I cannot accept that, in general, account should be taken of dispositions during the interim period. The intention of the interim arrangements was to discourage transactions in land at a price including development value which were not intended to lead to early development. If land which has already changed hands during this period is genuinely ripe for development there should be no difficulty in starting the development before the appointed day. The test of a bona fide transaction is that development value was paid only where the land was really ready for development and the provisions of the Bill apply this test.

On close companies I note what you say. I accept that there is some need for revision of Part I of Schedule 9.

The points you raise on capital gains tax concern matters to be dealt with in next year's Finance Bill and I note that a copy of your memorandum has been sent to the Chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue.

Yours sincerely,

car sales division, to the new commercial division, and to the industrial division operated under a new wholly-owned subsidiary – Tate (J.C.B.) Ltd. There is apparently a fourth division since reference is made in the directors' report to the fact that, with the industrial division now separately housed, additional space has been released for the agricultural division.

Based—as the company's name indicates—in Leeds, the company in all probability has the bulk of its shareholders in the Yorkshire area and they—again in all probability—know the company well enough. But the outsider looking at the Tate of Leeds report must find difficulty in worrying out the company's set-up—and it has to be worried out of the piecemeal information provided.

Tate of Leeds

TO say that the form of presentation of the report and accounts of Tate of Leeds Ltd leaves something to be desired is an understatement that a glance at this week's reprint will confirm. The company's business appears to be operated in four divisions but it is necessary to read the chairman's statement and the directors' report to get that impression.

The chairman refers to reorganization of the passenger

Just why the accounts of the company for the year to January 31st took so long to prepare is difficult to see. The accounts are dated July 20th so that shareholders received the report with very nearly half of the current year already spent. A company operating regionally – and almost locally – should not need such a length of time, even granting the fact that the chairman's statement suggests a fair amount of internal reorganization.

mercial division was delayed, because of soil conditions which required an extensive survey, and the resited industrial division began operating from new premises on March 1st this year. These changes may be taken into account when considering the time taken to present the report.

But at least the report does show the turnover on which trading profits were based. In the directors' report is the statement that 'while turnover at £4,108,000 is almost identical with that of the previous year, the state of trade generally in the second half made profit earning extremely difficult. A substantially reduced demand coupled with lower profit margins and the increased cost of financing stocks was accompanied by a continuing rise in expenses'.

First four months

Shareholders are brought relatively up to date by the statement that 'The profits for the first four months of 1966 are running at a lower level than those for the preceding year on a similar turnover, but if this level continues the final result will be at least equal to that of last year'. Since the statement was made there have come the further restrictions on hire-purchase and credit conditions.

Incidentally, where F. Snape Ltd, referred to in the parent company's balance sheet, fits in is impossible to tell. There is no other reference than this.

Mr T. Tate, chairman and managing director, tells shareholders that the board intends to deal in a realistic manner with problems posed by keen competition in the motor trade and the constant increase in costs. Plans are being considered to 'cover finance of a more permanent nature and to develop the sales potential of the area to a much greater degree than hitherto'.

Some part of the realistic approach should be saved for the presentation of an earlier and more realistic report next year.

New Capital Issues

STATISTICS compiled by the Midland Bank show that the amount of 'new money' raised in the United Kingdom by the issue of marketable securities in August was £71.9 million. This brings the total for the first eight months of 1966 to £560.8 million which compares with £418.7 million in the corresponding period of 1965.

Among the issues included in the total for August were those for Dunlop Rubber Co (£21 million), Charrington United Breweries (£8 million), The British Oxygen Co (£6 million), Government of the Republic of Ireland (£4.9 million), Unigate (£3.9 million) and The George Cohen 600 Group (£3.4 million).

CITY NOTES

THE City has had its sights this week on Blackpool and Washington – Blackpool because of the 'wage freeze' implications of the trade union deliberations there, and Washington because of that hardy annual the International Monetary Fund meeting and the possibility of a higher price for gold.

The gold price plant invariably sprouts into bloom during the first week in September and the blooms this year have proved the biggest and brightest for some years. They will, in all probability, wither and die even before the end of the month and the I.M.F. meeting, but they are colourful while they last.

Similarly the tentative equity rally in the home sections of the stock-market is unlikely to prove to have any lasting power. In some quarters it is held that there is scope for a technical rally worth twenty points in index terms to provide a second chance of getting out of the market.

On the face of things, however, a rally of such dimensions seems improbable, particularly if industrial profit and dividend forecasts remain discouraging. The early part of the fall – and the greater part – is probably over but the full extent of the drop has yet to be experienced.

Meanwhile, business remains small on the market and there is little indication of any change for the better from that situation. It is difficult to see circumstances developing calculated to restore the degree of confidence necessary for a revival in market activity.

POSSIBLY because of adverse seasonal factors, the July package deal of deflationary measures has not, as yet, made any impression on the flow of funds from London. There is certainly no evidence of the attraction of funds to London despite a Treasury Bill rate of  $6\frac{3}{4}\%$  per cent – the highest for forty years. The published loss of £19 million of gold reserves in August is merely a figure to be added to others which, in all, add up to a published loss of £177 million in six months. The foreign exchange market, however, has ceased to be swayed one way or the other by the Treasury's monthly gold reserves announcement, which is probably an achievement at which the Treasury has aimed.

THE squeeze' is now seen to be working in many and varied ways. Whitbreads the brewery group, for example, is being obliged to make 'ferocious' cuts in its capital spending programmes. Other brewery companies have given indications of overhauled spending programmes. It does not take long for the effect of such decisions to filter back through industry as a whole. The knowledge that major groups are cutting back, automatically puts a brake on development schemes over a wide industrial sphere. The severity of the July measures will be increasingly demonstrated over the next few months and even the Government itself may be surprised at the intensity of industrial reaction.

AN increasingly complicated business world first created by business advisers and then saw to it that they were kept in increasing business. It is not surprising, therefore, to learn from Mr E. N. B. Mitton, chairman of Inbucon Ltd, the industrial and management consultancy group, that 'demand for the services of the company has been good throughout the year'. Single and multiple services for large, medium and small organizations form the general pattern. Governments, home and abroad, have accounted for an increased volume of the company's business. For the British Government the group has undertaken work on the feasibility of national export corporations, on aviation and military affairs, on national supply and communications problems and on domestic regional economic development.

FOR STUDENTS

The Issue and Forfeiture of Shares

MANY students, especially at the intermediate level, find difficulty in recording the transactions involved in the issue of shares, and still more in recording their forfeiture. This article attempts to throw light on this favourite examination subject.

Procedure

An issue of shares involves a company or its agents in very considerable statistical work, as full particulars of each individual applicant's position must be carefully recorded and summarized so that the total number of shares applied for can be ascertained for comparison with the number of shares offered. If the offer is over-subscribed it will be essential to scale down the total applications in some way, either by limiting each allotment to a given figure (possibly with larger applications receiving a higher proportion than smaller ones) or by balloting. The purpose of whatever method is adopted is to equate applications to shares available as fairly as possible.

Under the Companies Act, 1948, an applicant for shares must lodge a cheque with his application form, either for the full amount of the shares or for a proportion thereof (minimum 5 per cent), depending upon the terms of the issue. If the latter course has been adopted, a further sum is usually payable on allotment, so if the shares allotted to an applicant are fewer than those applied for, some or all of the excess application money is frequently retained by the company in payment of the amount due on allotment, which is of course calculated on the number of shares allotted and not on those applied for.

Shares are frequently issued at a premium, i.e. the company receives cash in excess of the nominal value of the shares allotted, and the terms of issue may provide for the remainder of the total due for shares and premium to be paid by one or more subsequent calls, payable at dates stipulated in the terms of issue or, alternatively, when the directors so decide.

It will be seen from the foregoing that all cash received from applicants must be carefully recorded so that sums received on application in excess of that appropriate to a smaller number of shares allotted (or some of it) can be properly set off against sums due on allotment, and cheques for any remaining overpayment prepared and dispatched to the applicants.

A further complication is that an allottee may, for a limited period, sell his partly paid shares on the stock exchange. Therefore, any calls subsequent to allotment will be due from the purchaser and not from the original allottee. Not later than two months after allotment, however, share certificates must be prepared and issued, the register of members written up, and the total of individual share-holdings agreed with the entries in the private ledger. The transactions may be finally summarized as follows:

Debits – cash for:

- (i) application moneys received;
- (ii) allotment moneys received;
- (iii) call(s) moneys received.

Credits – share capital account, for the called-up nominal value of the shares issued;
share premium account, for the premium;
cash, for moneys returned to unsuccessful or partly unsuccessful applicants.

Application and allotment accounts

As, however, it is necessary to control each successive stage of the issue, it is usual to open accounts for (i) application and allotments, and (ii) each successive call. These may be regarded as controlling personal accounts for the whole body of people who (i) apply for and are allotted shares, and (ii) are responsible for calls. Like any other personal account, they are debited with sums due; in this case (i) the total amount due on application and allotment for the number of shares allotted, and (ii) the total amount of the call.

Cash received is credited to these accounts, and repayments to wholly or partly unsuccessful applicants will, of course, be debited to the application and allotment account. If all sums due are received by the company, no balances should remain, but if any allottees (or persons purchasing partly paid shares from them) are in default, debit balances will remain which must be identified with the particular persons concerned.

Share capital account

It has been stated that the application and allotment accounts and the call accounts are debited with the sums due from the general body of persons to whom shares are allotted. The corresponding credits at each stage will be to the share capital and share premium accounts, the respective sums depending upon the amounts successively due and the allocation between 'shares' and 'premium' as set out in the terms of issue. Accordingly, the share capital account is built up stage by stage, its total representing the amount called up to date on the shares allotted. When, therefore, the shares are fully called up, the share capital account will be complete, and furthermore, when the shares are fully paid up, the respective 'personal' accounts for 'Applications and allotments' and 'Calls' will have been closed by the receipt of cash.

Illustration

The foregoing procedure is illustrated in the example overleaf. (The student should note (i) the gradual build up of the share capital account; (ii) the treatment of cash received.

from partly unsuccessful applicants; and (iii) the reconciliation of the balance on the call accounts.)

A company issued a prospectus inviting applications for 100,000 shares of 10s each at a price of 17s 6d per share. The terms of the issue called for payments of:
2s per share on application (January 10th);
11s 6d per share on allotment, including the premium of 7s 6d (January 17th);
2s per share as a first call (February 17th);
2s per share as a second call (March 17th).

Applications, all with cheques (which were banked) for the sums due totalled 175,000 shares. Applicants for 25,000 shares received no allotment, letters of regret and cheques being posted on January 20th and the remainder were scaled down proportionately, the overpayments being set off against the sums due on allotment. The remaining sums due on allotment were received in full by January 31st and the first call moneys were received, except for 1,000 shares, by February 28th. By March 31st, moneys for the second call received and banked totalled £9,750.

Forfeiture

It will be noticed that, except for the calls in arrear, the company has received cash equivalent to the offer price of the shares issued, viz. 100,000 shares at 17s 6d per share. If the articles permit the directors may, at their discretion proceed to forfeit the shares of the defaulters, thus cancelling their rights to participate in the capital and profits of the company. In these circumstances:

(i) Share capital is reduced by the called up value of the shares forfeited and cancelled, viz. 2,500 at 10s .. .. .	£	1,250
(ii) The unpaid calls are written off against the above .. .. .		350
		£900

The composition of the balance of £900 must be carefully noted. It represents the cash paid by the defaulting applicants on account of the shares forfeited and which by reason of the forfeiture is retainable by the company. Its composition is as follows:

			A.B.	X.Y.
			s	d	s d

The cash paid in respect of the premium, viz. 7s 6d per share on 2,500 shares remains to the credit of share premium account and requires no adjustment.

To record the forfeiture, it is desirable to open a forfeited shares account and to proceed as follows:

Reissue of forfeited shares

The balance on forfeited shares account may be carried forward, or alternatively, transferred to the credit of a capital reserve account, e.g. the share premium account, unless the directors decide to reissue the forfeited shares to other persons. This they may do at a price which may be lower than the original issue price, providing that the total receivable from old and new allottees is not less than the nominal value of the shares. In the above examples, £900 has been received (and forfeited) on shares with a nominal value of £1,250, so at least £350 must be received from the new allottees.

Assuming that the directors decide to reissue the 2,500 shares to P.Q. at a price of, say, 6s per share (£750), a forfeited shares reissued account must be opened and debited with the nominal value of the shares reissued, viz. £1,250, the corresponding credit restoring share capital account to its original figure of £50,000.

The issue price of 6s will produce cash of £750 which will be posted to the credit of the forfeited shares reissued account, leaving a debit balance of 4s per share or £500. This may be transferred from forfeited shares account, whose balance, it will be remembered, records the cash forfeited by the original allottees, thus leaving a final balance equivalent to the total cash received from old and new allottees in excess of the nominal value of the shares. The entries are as follows:

July 1 Balance, carried forward .. ..	50,000	June 30 Balance, brought down
		97,500 at 10s .. ..	48,750

		Forfeited shares account .. ..	500

The balance of forfeited shares account must then be transferred to share premium account, as representing a further premium on the issue, forfeiture and reissue of the 2,500 shares. Its composition is as follows:

Amount paid by A.B. and C.D. on forfeited shares as above .. ..		900

Less Paid by P.Q., 2,500 at 6s .. ..	750
		500
		£400

Conclusion

It is suggested that the student, on completing the entries to record a particular example of the procedure on the issue, forfeiture and reissue of shares should carefully reconcile the balances of the accounts in the manner set out above. By so doing he can satisfy himself that his entries faithfully reflect the transactions which have taken place.

AN IMPORTANT NEW BOOK

Just published

MANUAL OF AUDITING by Vivian R. V. Cooper, F.C.A.

THE FIRST
OF ITS KIND
IN THE

In recent years the whole approach to auditing has changed. The old concepts of routine checking and vouching have gone and new standards are being set and new procedures evolved. This has become more than ever necessary by the increasing use of computers for which auditing techniques now have to be designed.

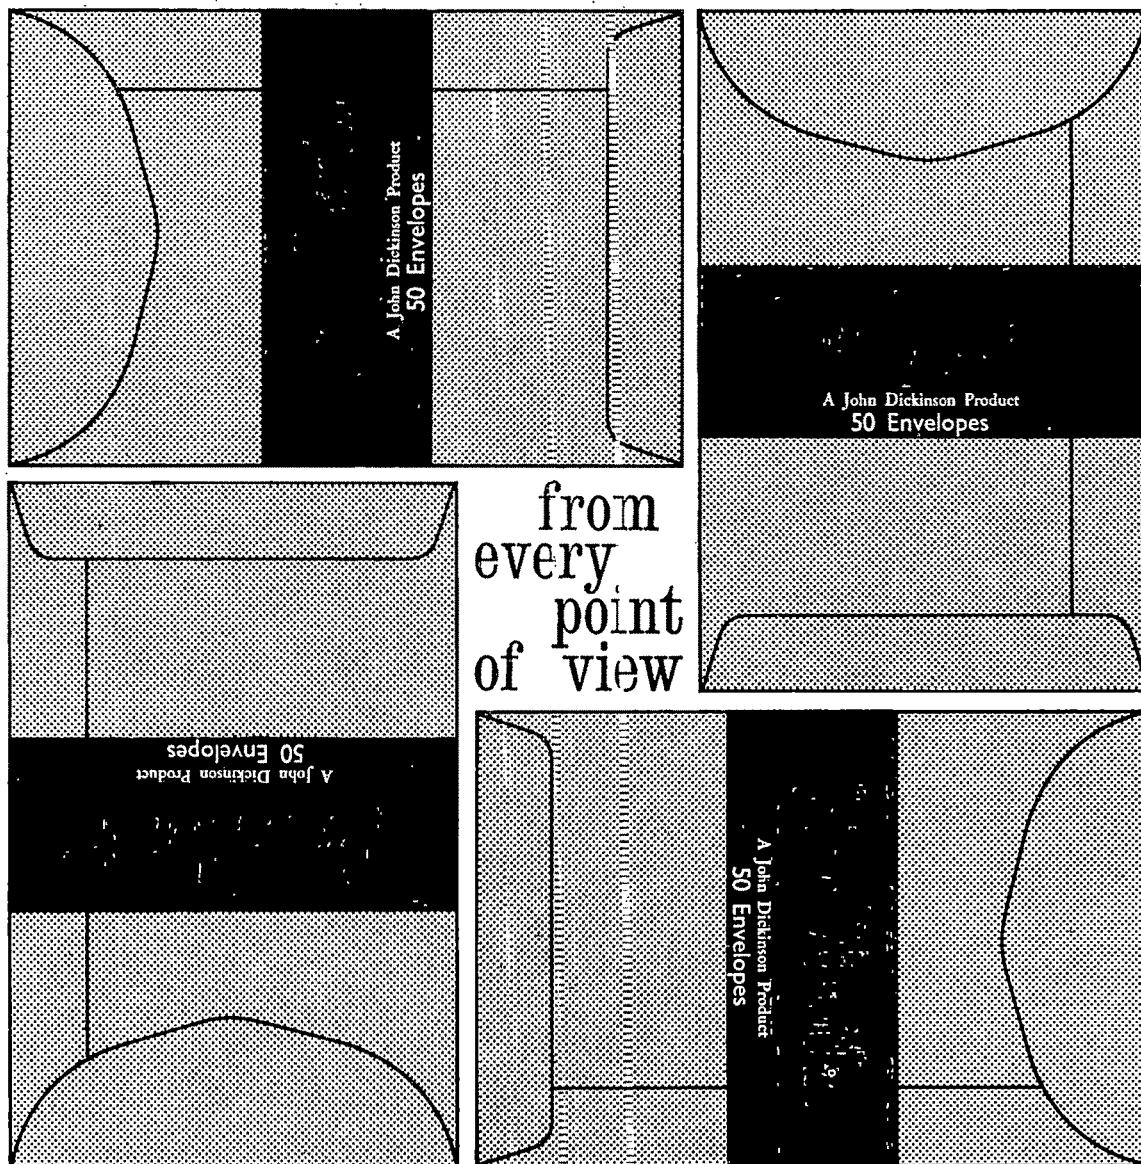

Taking as his starting-point the system of internal control installed by management, the auditor's task is to point out the weaknesses to his client and to make a tailor-made audit programme to fit the job in which test of the day-to-day transactions are cut to a minimum. The auditor now observes, at regular intervals, the physical stock-taking carried out by his client's staff; if his report to shareholders is not to be qualified, he requires his client to maintain a higher standard of book-keeping and accounts than hitherto. His audit is carefully planned and is backed by a well defined system for the preparation, filing and presentation of working papers.

This book, which includes a comprehensive set of specimen forms and schedules, is the first of its kind in the United Kingdom which sets out these modern techniques and procedures in a readily understandable form. It is essentially practical and, except for a few changes necessary to make it suitable for publication, is based on the manual which has been developed over a long period of years, and is in daily use, by a firm of chartered accountants in practice.

A Guide to SELECTIVE EMPLOYMENT TAX

By F. H. BRITTENDEN, B.Litt., M.A.

Head of the U.K. Tax Division, Shell International Petroleum Co. Ltd., formerly one of Her Majesty's Inspectors of Taxes.

SET started this month – and there can have been few measures in recent years which caused more furore in business circles. All employers have to pay up – but there will be a gap of several months when they will have to consider where they stand in relation to getting their money back. Many will wish to dispute their SET classification and take the matter to their industrial tribunal. Then there is the delicate point that in general the Government only pays premiums to firms whose manufacturing staff exceed their office workers, which certainly leaves room for some tactical manœuvring.

This readable guide to the ins and outs will therefore be extremely welcome. With his experience both in industry and the Inland Revenue, the author is well equipped to explain the new tax. After some brief comments on its background, the book deals with the provisions for payment, refunds and premiums and also with the manner in which the tax will be administered.

'Butterworth publish a timely Guide to Selective Employment Tax. It explains this complex tax, which starts next Monday and which is driving most employers mad'. – The Daily Express.

'Help for employers seeking to find their way through the complications of the tax is given. . .'. – The Daily Telegraph.

MANUAL OF AUDITING

by Vivian R. V. Cooper, F.C.A.

THE FIRST
IN THE
UNITED KINGDOM

78s 3d post free U.K.

In recent years the whole approach to auditing has changed. The old concepts of routine checking and vouching have gone and new standards are being set and new procedures evolved. This has become more than ever necessary by the increasing use of computers for which auditing techniques now have to be designed.

Taking as his starting-point the system of internal control installed by management, the auditor's task is to point out the weaknesses to his client and to make a tailor-made audit programme to fit the job in which test of the day-to-day transactions are cut to a minimum. The auditor now observes, at regular intervals, the physical stock-taking carried out by his client's staff; if his report to shareholders is not to be qualified, he requires his client to maintain a higher standard of book-keeping and accounts than hitherto. His audit is carefully planned and is backed by a well defined system for the preparation, filing and presentation of working papers.

This book, which includes a comprehensive set of specimen forms and schedules, is the first of its kind in the United Kingdom which sets out these modern techniques and procedures in a readily understandable form. It is essentially practical and, except for a few changes necessary to make it suitable for publication, is based on the manual which has been developed over a long period of years, and is in daily use, by a firm of chartered accountants in practice.

STATISTICS FOR ACCOUNTANTS

BY R. B. BROCKINGTON, B.Com., A.C.A.

WHY SHOULD AN ACCOUNTANT NEED STATISTICS?

The easy answer to this is that he will need to pass his examinations. All the major accountancy bodies now include statistics in their examination syllabuses. The student, be he working for the examination of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, The Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants, The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants or The Institute of Company Accountants will need a certain degree of statistical knowledge.

The more difficult answer is that he will need it in his work as an accountant. The fact that these professional bodies include it in their syllabuses indicates that they believe so and this is emphasized by the syllabus for the newly introduced JOINT DIPLOMA IN MANAGEMENT ACCOUNTING SERVICES where the study of statistics is required to an even more advanced level. From being merely a recording function accountancy has become a live information function. A major part of all information used and required by senior management is, and must be, supplied by the accountant.

turning a blind eye?

Have you been turning a blind eye on the disastrous effect that the falling value of the £ can have on your staff pension scheme? Very probably your scheme ignores this factor completely.

In fairness to the staff, including yourself, you should send for 'Better Pensions'. It explains why a privately invested fund under our management can be expected to provide increased benefits at no extra cost, and can provide a hedge against inflation.

Grants — Capital or Discount?

WHEN the need arises to present revised or additional information in financial statements, accountants are faced with the task of devising appropriate procedures and accompanying explanations which should be both concise and informative. Where the problem is one of phraseology only, the various modes of expression soon coalesce into a generally received formula, but uniformity is less readily achieved when the varying procedures reflect distinct points of principle. However, published accounts function nowadays as a source of standardized comparatives for investment purposes and of statistical information contributing to policy decisions by Government; it is therefore arguable that the unity of the accountancy profession now so much canvassed should first find expression in agreed solutions to new problems.

These comments are prompted by the publication of a paper under the auspices of The Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland, and reproduced on other pages in this issue. It discusses alternative accounting treatments of the investment grants made available under Part I of the Industrial Development Act 1966, and it follows five months after the publication of an interim statement by the Council of the English Institute (reproduced in The Accountant, April 9th).

Having regard to the extent of the co-operation between the two bodies in other directions we find it surprising that the opportunity should not have been taken to harmonize the two sets of dicta or at least to elaborate the grounds for the remarkable divergence of the opinions recorded.

The English view recommended that the amount of actual or estimated grants (to be disclosed for each accounting period) should be deducted in the balance sheet from the fixed assets to which they relate. It was proposed that such grants should be credited to revenue over the life of the assets and apparently this was to be achieved by a proportionate reduction of the depreciation charge (normally computed on a straight-line basis).

The Scottish approach reflects anxiety lest this treatment should imperil the maintenance of an adequate cash flow, working capital becoming depleted by over-lavish distributions or generous pricing. Retribution would await this 'rake's progress' if replacements fall due at a time when grants have perhaps become curtailed or withdrawn. Extra capital might then have to be found while future profits would bear the brunt of augmented depreciation.

The preferred alternative (subject to two dissenting opinions) lies in the transfer of grants to capital reserve (method number 5). The reasoning behind this is set out in paragraph (d) which equates grants with other forms of capital employed, whether provided by subscription, loan, retention of earnings or gifts. Older readers may detect a similarity with the approach statutorily enforced some twenty years ago in relation to excess profits tax post-war refunds, which were required to be separately identified and held apart from the balances available for distribution to members.

The controversy as to whether grants should ultimately be credited to capital or to revenue appears to us to be somewhat outmoded now that the introduction of corporation tax has, in most instances, removed the significance of the barrier between reserves designated 'capital' but legally free for distribution, and the revenue balances which formerly represented taxed profits only. However, the Scottish study has highlighted the problem of maintaining fixed assets in good heart. The paper defines depreciation as a measure of the diminution in the value of assets, a provision for their replacement or a means of recovering the cost of an asset through the products manufactured.

In 1945 the English Institute's recommendation on 'Depreciation of Fixed Assets' rejected any departure in accounts from the historical record of actual cost. Later the debate as to the validity of traditional accounting concepts in the face of rising price levels led to a re-examination and also a re-affirmation of this standpoint (1949 recommendation), although greater prominence was given to the place of a specific capital reserve as the appropriate medium for provisions required to finance enhanced cost of replacements.

The debate continued, a further recommendation being issued in 1952 ('Accounting in relation to changes in the purchasing power of money'), and discussions took place with the Scottish Institute. The outcome was the vindication as a fundamental principle of U.K. accounting of the need to preserve a dichotomy between selected indicators of the effect on asset replacement of falling currency values on the one hand and the recorded financial history of those assets on the other.

The study of investment grant problems should therefore be widened to secure practical recognition of the fact that to treat pounds Edwardian, Georgian and neo-Elizabethan as of equal value with the forthcoming decimal pound/cent unit is, as the Scottish paper observes in a different context, 'a somewhat clumsy device and there is no merit in perpetuating it'.

Redundancy Payments and Tax

THE Redundancy Payments Act 1965, which received the Royal Assent on August 5th, 1965, provides for the making by employers of payments to employees in respect of redundancy, the establishment of a so-called 'Redundancy Fund' with provision for payment into it by employers and by the State and for payments out of it. There is a corresponding Act for Northern Ireland, bearing the title 'Contracts of Employment and Redundancy Payments Act (Northern Ireland) 1965'. Both Acts provided for an 'appointed day' which was later fixed as December 6th, 1965, and the CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER gave an undertaking that the Finance Act 1966 would provide exemptions from tax in respect of redundancy payments. Section 38 of that Act is the result.

Where an employee who has been continuously employed for the requisite period is either dismissed by reason of redundancy, or is laid off or kept on short time, then the employer has to pay him a 'redundancy payment' calculated on arbitrary lines laid down in Schedule 1 of the Redundancy Payments Act.

What is 'redundancy'? The dismissed employee is deemed to be dismissed by reason of redundancy if the dismissal is attributable wholly or mainly to:

- (a) the fact that his employer has ceased, or intends to cease, to carry on business for the purposes of which the employee was employed by him; or has ceased, or intends to cease, to carry on that business in the place where the employee was so employed; or
- (b) the fact that the requirements of that business for the employee to carry out work of a particular kind in the place where he was so employed have ceased or diminished or are expected to cease or diminish.

'Business' is widely defined in section 25 (1) but section 19 further extends it to cover the ordinary domestic employee (excluding close relatives of the employer).

Now it was the declared aim of the Government, in their massive shake-up of the direct taxation system, that people should not receive sums which were for all practical purposes income, without being required to pay tax on them. In other words, the base of taxation was to be much broader, so that everyone could be treated equally. However, the Government no doubt subscribe to the well-known adage that some people are more equal than others. Section 38 (1) of the Finance Act 1966 reads:

'Any redundancy payment, and the corresponding amount of any other employer's payment, shall be exempt from income tax under Schedule E.'

Section 38 (7) says that 'redundancy payment' has the same meaning as in Part II of the Redundancy Payments Act 1965, which in fact does not give any meaning to it. The meaning is to be culled from the various provisions of Part I.

'Employer's payment' is as defined in section 36 (6) of the Redundancy Payments Act, i.e. any payment falling within section 30 (1) (a), (b), (c) of that Act. These last provisions bring in not only normal redundancy payments made by the employer but also those payments under schemes approved under the Act.

Having read section 38 (1) of the Finance Act 1966, one must go on to subsection (8) which modifies it by saying that the reference to tax under Schedule E 'does not include a reference to tax under section 37 of the Finance Act 1960'. Accordingly, redundancy payments do have to be brought into account in determining the employee's Schedule E liability under the 'handshake' rules. The exemption is thus a partial Schedule E exemption. If the employee were carrying on a trade assessed under Schedule D and the redundancy payment was a trading receipt, the exemption would not apply. The exemption is retrospective to all payments made after December 5th, 1965.

Section 32 of the Redundancy Payments Act empowers the Minister to pay to an employee the redundancy payment which the employer ought to have made but had not made, and of course gives the Minister power to recover it from the employer. Section 38 (6) of the Finance Act 1966 directs that where the Minister pays a sum under section 32, then section 38 is to apply as if that sum had been paid on account of the redundancy or other employer's payment. In so far as the employer reimburses the Minister, it is treated, for the purposes of section 38, as paid by the employer. Thus the Schedule E exemption applies here too.

So much for the recipient. What about the payer and his income tax? If the payment is made in respect of employment wholly in a trade, profession or vocation carried on by the employer 'and within the charge to income tax or corporation tax', then the redundancy payment or other employer's payment 'shall be allowable as a deduction in computing for the purposes of Schedule D the profits or gains or losses of the trade' etc. (section 38 (2)); the subsection adds 'if it is not otherwise to be so treated'. One must remember here that although in many instances redundancy payments would be deductible in any case, the general rule would be the other way. Ex gratia payments made when a trade is permanently discontinued are not allowable under the ordinary rules, although the strict rule is insisted on in practice only in the case of large sums. Of course redundancies caused by a change in the method of working are in a different category. This relaxation of the Case I rules even extends to payments made long after the trade has in fact been discontinued. In their case, they are treated for tax purposes as having been made on the date of discontinuance.

When section 38 was referred to at the committee stage, the Opposition asked the Government to consider a similar relaxation in favour of redundancy payments not made under the new Act. Mr DIAMOND, the Chief Secretary, answered:

'Voluntary payments of this kind on a cessation are not payments in carrying on the trade, and therefore they would not attract income tax relief.'

Pressed to use his influence with the Inland Revenue to be more helpful in the case of voluntary payments, he said:

'The right hon. gentleman has raised a new point, which requires careful consideration, and we shall give it that consideration.'

Meanwhile, the law can hardly be said to have been simplified by section 38 (2).

If an employer makes a redundancy payment, has it allowed, and then recovers it from the redundancy fund, it is only fair that he should be taxed on it. Section 38 (2) provides expressly that 'the amount of the rebate recoverable shall (if it is not otherwise to be so treated) be treated as a receipt to be brought into account in computing those profits or gains'. It does not specify for what period the receipt is to be brought into account.

The word 'business' in the Redundancy Payments Act goes much wider than 'trade, profession or vocation'. Section 38 (3) deals with redundancy payments made in respect of employment wholly in a 'business' carried on by the employer, 'and expenses of management of the business are eligible for relief under section 57 of the Finance Act 1965 as extended by section 67 (1) (b) of that Act (investment companies and unit trusts)'.

The amount by which redundancy payment or the corresponding amount of the other employer's payment exceeds the recoverable rebate is to be 'allowable as expenses of management eligible for relief under that section'. If the payment is made after the discontinuance of the business, the net amount allowable is to be treated as paid on the day of discontinuance.

There remains the property owner who makes a claim for maintenance and management under Case VIII of Schedule D. Section 38 (4) applies where a redundancy payment or other employer's payment is made in respect of employment wholly in maintaining or managing 'property', the expenses of maintaining or managing which were eligible for relief under paragraphs 1 or 13 of Schedule 4 to the Finance Act 1963. The subsection provides that the amount by which the redundancy payment, or the corresponding amount of the other employer's payment, exceeds the recoverable rebate is to be treated for the purposes of Schedule 4 as a payment made by the employer in respect of the maintenance or management of the property 'or of such part of it as he may elect'. If the payment was made after the latest time when it could be taken into account under normal Schedule 4 rules, it is to be treated as made at that latest time.

Section 38 (5) is directed to preventing a double allowance under section 38 (2) (3) (4). It also provides that if the employee was employed in such a way that different parts of his remuneration fell to be treated in different ways for tax purposes (i.e. the employer's tax purposes) then there is to be a corresponding apportionment of the redundancy payment (in so far as it exceeds any rebate). If this treatment brings in more than one of subsections (2), (3) and (4), then each applies separately to the relevant apportioned part.

The Association's Examination Results

OF the 6,150 candidates who sat for the June examinations of The Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants, 1,889 (30.7 per cent) were successful. The names of those who passed sections III and IV of the examinations – formerly designated Final, Parts I and II – are given on other pages in this issue.

In section IV there were 685 candidates of whom 218 (31.8 per cent) passed. First place and prize was won by Mr J. R. Cook, of Hailsham; second place by Mr F. N. Harvey, of London; third place by Mr J. R. S. Brace, of Uxbridge; fourth place by Mr J. J. Hobbs, of London, and fifth place by Mr C. Campbell, of Chelmsford.

A total of 1,427 candidates sat for section III of whom 304 (21.3 per cent) were successful. First place was awarded to Mr K. Shim Chow Min, of London; second place was won by Mr G. Gould, of Wednesbury; third place by Miss M. A. Olayisade, of London; fourth place by Mr S. O. Olusanya, of Leeds, and fifth place by Mr M. Sharples, of Reading.

There were 1,521 candidates for section II of whom 579 (38 per cent) passed, and in section I a total of 2,250 sat, of whom 683 (30.3 per cent) passed. Seventy-nine (55.2 per cent) of the 143 candidates for the Preliminary examination were successful.

Institute Tax Courses

LEADING tax experts in the accountancy profession are addressing fellow members of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales in a series of four residential courses which started at Nottingham University last Tuesday and are continuing until next Monday.

These courses on current tax practice are the first full-scale courses of their kind to be undertaken by the Institute. They have attracted chartered accountants from all over Britain – to a total of 200 – to hear lectures on corporation tax, the taxation of capital gains and tax planning and management.

The concern of accountants to keep abreast with the latest professional thinking on taxation in view of the profound changes that have taken place is indicated by the fact that the series of courses was over-subscribed two and a half times.

Company Fraud

ALIQUIDATION, even when frauds are discovered, 'is organized in practice to produce cash and not convictions', asserted Mr Morris Finer, Q.C., in the course of an address to the British Crime Congress last week. Even if some of the creditors 'feel vindictive at the start, commercial considerations usually assert themselves'. Any such prosecution would cut across a cash settlement and involve the Director of Public Prosecutions; the fact that in Mr Finer's experience the matter was usually dropped was, in his view, also to the relief of the Director of Public Prosecutions.

Company law had gaps and ambiguities on an unacceptable scale, contended Mr Finer. There existed a large twilight territory in which the law still groped for 'the distinction between good business and sharp practice and sharp practice and fraud'. The case for increasing the maximum penalties was obvious; some of them were ludicrously low. For example, a breach of the section which rules that a company may not finance or help finance the purchase of its own shares attracted a maximum penalty of £100 although millions might be involved. The speaker noted that the courts 'treated indolence and incompetence as natural risks to which a shareholder exposed himself', while the law which enabled delinquent directors to be barred from office was very rarely applied.

Of the accountancy profession in its role as auditors, Mr Finan remarked that like every other profession the bracket which spans the best, the middling and worst standards of competence was very large, but the situation of even the best was one that is inherently prone to tensions. The auditor was required to perform with complete objectivity, irrespective of consequences, and involving investigation and probing of matters which the company might prefer to keep sheltered from him. On the other hand, the company was nearly always a client for tax affairs and the general range of accountancy services of the same firm. However, reputable accountants, declared Mr Finan, auditing reputable companies did not find the situation difficult and could override the tensions or rather convert the situation into one where reliance on the accountant was coupled with respect for his professional status. But less reputable or incompetent accountants exposed to pressures from disreputable directors might ease their consciences with the reflection that a spaniel is a sort of watchdog too.

I.M.F. Report

FOR the first time in the post-war period, all the major industrial countries are simultaneously enjoying high levels of employment. This is the main finding in the twenty-first annual report of the International Monetary Fund which reviews the world economy in 1965.

There are a number of problems, however, to mar this otherwise cheering aspect. There is, for example, the inflationary pressure emerging in the U.S.A., now enjoying its sixth year of uninterrupted economic expansion. The I.M.F. authorities are concerned that this rate of growth cannot be sustained indefinitely and that the inflationary forces will affect the rest of the world. The report comments that the U.S. Government should assign a higher priority than in the past to the objective of international equilibrium, and that this could be done without sacrificing in any undue degree domestic policy objectives.

The I.M.F. authorities are critical of both the U.S.A. and the United Kingdom in respect of the measures they have taken to limit the outflow of capital, primarily on the grounds that such restrictions will tend to retard the rate of economic growth of the developing economies. The report has nothing new to say on the apparently insoluble problem of world liquidity; the gulf between the major currency powers is as large as ever.

The report spotlights one aspect of the problem confronting sterling in a table which shows the ratio of gold and hard currency reserves to total imports. For the United Kingdom the figure is barely 20 per cent, whereas for most other countries the corresponding percentage is twice as large. When one considers the responsibilities assumed by sterling and London as an international financial centre, the inadequacy of the reserves is self-evident. Since it seems impossible significantly to increase those reserves, the time may well be coming for a review of the international role of sterling.

Tighter Squeeze

IN a thought-provoking review of Britain's economic situation, the current Bulletin of The Credit Insurance Association Ltd reports that the 1965 figure of new business showed a 60 per cent increase on the previous year, while in the seven months to the end of July 1966 leading underwriters had been asked to collect a total of more than £1 million in overdue accounts – an increase of 22½ per cent on the comparable period of 1965.

The Bulletin states that the volume of bad debts has been increasing steadily, and whereas at first the losses were concentrated in selected industries, the severe credit conditions are now being felt by all sectors of industry. The compilers of the Bulletin argue that the full effects of the selective employment tax have been underestimated and that, with the Government's other restrictive measures, the credit situation will deteriorate still further.

One consequence of the current squeeze already reflected in an analysis of company accounts prepared by the Board of Trade and The Economist, is the increase of trade credit in substitution for bank loans. There is, as the Bulletin notes, a limit to this development and it remains to be seen whether the Government will press the squeeze to the point at which an increased number of bankruptcies and liquidations are inevitable.

Machine Tool Industry

ALTHOUGH the machine tool industry in the United Kingdom contributes less than 1 per cent of the nation's industrial production, its significance for the economy and its future rate of growth is far greater. The pace of technological and industrial change must lean heavily upon the development of new machine tools. The Government's obvious concern with the state of the industry and its future prospects is certainly common knowledge.

A new report prepared by Chesham Amalgamations & Investments Ltd on the relative performance of the industry with its counterpart in other countries does nothing to relieve current concern. In 1964 the United Kingdom exported £46 million of machine tools out of a total output of £121 million; imports amounted to £38 million.

Whereas imports are equal to almost one-third of the total output in the United Kingdom, in the U.S.A. the comparable figure is 2.2 per cent and in Western Germany 10.1 per cent. The total labour force in the British industry is only 13 per cent less than that of the United States industry, but the latter's output is three times as great. Even more significant is the fact that the average size of the labour force in American firms is only half that of British firms.

Nevertheless, the Chesham report argues the case for more amalgamations of British firms into larger units which can 'more easily carry the burden of research costs, build up stocks for slack times and develop aggressive marketing'. There seems to be a need for a greater degree of specialization within British firms and the development of more sophisticated products.

It is a moot point whether the current phase of restriction will retard or accelerate the machine tool industry's process of adaptation to keep abreast of the demands of an age of automation. That imports for the first half of 1966 exceeded exports is serious indeed.

This is My Life

by An Industrious Accountant

THE door of my room opened, after a perfunctory knock, to admit Scotty. He came in with a moody nod and slumped down unasked in an arm-chair. 'It's hellish to be getting old,' he said.

A good many years have passed since our dour sales manager and I first crossed swords over his deep-based antipathy to accountancy requirements; years which have at length encrusted his prickly individuality with a reasonably mellow veneer. Nowadays, though he still maintains a habit – not untypical of certain of our more uncouth colleagues – of jibing at our professional punctiliousness, he has learned something of the value of financial reports. To ensure the accuracy of his understanding, however, we spell out their meaning in simple sentences.

Anyhow, I sympathized with his gloom. The inexorable march of time is catching up with Scotty. Gone are the days when he and his departmental colleagues ran their sales campaigns by hunch; when he bought relentlessly on what his instincts told him was ultimately a rising market. Going, or at least poised to go, are the days of quarterly budgetary control, when punched cards furnished him with masses of comparative data under actual-versus-forecast headings, and some juggling of invoices at sales office level kept the door to recklessness wide open. In the place of these carefree adventures of untrammelled intuition is a new principle, the art of management by objectives.

The managing director initiated this impressively titled procedure recently. A disciplinarian by instinct and a specific standard-setter by university training, he has an innate dislike of unplanned activities.

'De'il settle his hash for him,' said Scotty resentfully; 'it wasna a scientific system but it aye worked out well.') Instead the M.D. decreed decision-making by groups; all senior departmental executives were required to join in policy formation, their personal involvement thus committing them to active participation in the subsequent struggle to implement their aims successfully.

In Mantles, Furnishings, or Music, over drip-dry shirts, hi-fi L.P. records, or Donegal tweeds, the discussions raged. Stock rundowns and clearance sales provided material for interminable argument. ('They're no' executing the orders,' said Scotty; 'they're just gabbling their silly heads off'.)

His discontent stemmed from the fact that control by committee had replaced the old hierarchical formula of decision by the boss. When a footwear committee was formed comprising Scotty and his deputy, together with the buyer of Ladies' Shoes and his two chief assistants, with the departmental accountant to furnish statistics (interlaced with provocative red herrings), majority rule prevailed; democracy reigned. It was unfortunately exemplified too often by a taste for safety devoid of risk-taking; of following rather than leading. On Scotty, as manager, devolved the long-term responsibility, but his authority was diluted to vanishing point. The committee had decided to concentrate on imported Italian shoes for the winter sales, against his dogmatic views, and he was furious.

At his age it was hard to learn modern techniques designed to promote harmony and unanimity as success criteria, rather than the fiery zeal for achievement that had always been his aim. He cocked a rueful eye at me as he quoted the couplet from The Mikado:

'All must sip the cup of sorrow –
I today and thou tomorrow.'

'Where do we go from here?' he queried. All I could counsel was loyalty to the new rule and farewell to the old autocracy; but I was by no means confident that the change would necessarily lead to higher net profits.

Accounting for Investment Grants

The following paper was prepared for and has been accepted by the Research and Publications Committee of The Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland. It discusses alternative accounting treatments of investment grants and indicates the one which, in the opinion of the majority of the committee, is most desirable. A minority of the committee held other views, and reference is made to these at the end of the paper. (See additional comment on page 329.)

UNDER the Industrial Development Act 1966 and certain other legislation investment grants are to replace investment allowances as the fiscal incentive to investment. The effect of these grants will be substantial and cumulative, and it is desirable that a generally accepted method of presentation should be adopted in company accounts for dealing with such grants so that those interested may obtain full and consistent information about them.

In selecting the most satisfactory method of presentation a number of factors should be considered. These include the following:

- (a) Investment grants take the place of investment allowances, and while they have the same object of encouraging capital investment by industry, there are fundamental differences between them. Thus it would be a mistake to deal with investment grants in the same way as investment allowances simply to maintain some continuity of comparison in their effect.

The benefit obtained from investment allowances arose from their application to a firm's tax liability, and the consequent tax relief unavoidably emerged in the profit and loss account. It became accepted practice to indicate the amount of this relief in some appropriate way on the face of the profit and loss account and frequently to allocate a corresponding sum out of profits to a specific capital reserve in order to remove from the balance of profits normally regarded as available for distribution an amount which bore no relation to the year's operating activities but was a direct consequence of the amount of capital expenditure incurred. This was a somewhat clumsy device and there is no merit in perpetuating it.

- (b) The Act makes it clear (sections 6-7) that the grants will be variable, selective and discriminatory, and it would be unwise to assume that grants identical to those made on the installation of assets would still be available when these assets were replaced. It would seem that whether the charge for depreciation is regarded as a measure of the diminution in the value of assets, a provision for their replacement, or a means of recovering the cost of an asset through the products which it manufactures, a business would be imprudent to calculate the charge after deduction of the investment grant. Moreover, if the depreciation charge is reduced by the value of the investment grant, the benefit of the latter will tend to be passed on to the consumer in the form of lower prices. This would vitiate the purpose of the grant which is intended as a stimulus to investment and not as a subsidy to the consumer.

- (c) The grants are to be treated as capital receipts for tax purposes, as is made clear in the White Paper on Investment Incentives (Cmnd 2874) which preceded the Act. Although the treatment of an item in accounts is not necessarily governed by a ruling for tax purposes, the intention in this instance supports the conclusion that sums contributed towards the cost of specific capital projects must in logic be regarded as capital and not revenue receipts.
- (d) There is a clear and logical distinction between the capital employed in a business and the assets in which that capital is invested. Every business is supported financially by the funds obtained for that purpose, whether provided by subscription, loan, retention of earnings or by gift. These funds form the capital employed in the business; they are usually introduced in the form of cash and then invested in fixed or floating assets. Subsequently, the funds move from one asset to another until ultimately eliminated by the scrapping of assets, by actual losses incurred or by repayment, but while they continue to be used in the business they form part of the capital employed or the net worth. It is confusing to treat one part of such funds as a deduction from the cost of a specific asset rather than as part of the capital employed. To do so distorts the true facts and understates the total capital employed. To treat investment grants in this way will give rise to misleading and distorted comparisons between different companies and different assets which qualify for different rates of investment grants by reason of location, type of industry, type of asset or change of regulations.

- (e) Whatever method of presentation is adopted, it will be an administrative necessity to record the gross cost of each asset separately, both because this is the way in which the expenditure will be incurred and because the total gross cost will be required to substantiate the claim for an investment grant. Equally, it will be essential to identify each grant with the asset to which it refers, in order to calculate the net value of the asset for tax purposes. This is nothing new as it is now common practice for firms to maintain detailed plant inventories for various purposes and, in particular, as a basis for calculating depreciation on a straight line basis and for tax purposes. Thus a difference in presentation for accounting and tax purposes is already fully accepted and there is no case for adopting an accounting presentation solely to conform with tax requirements.

It has also become customary to recognize the importance of the net cash flow in appraising the return on an investment project. For this purpose it is appropriate to relate the net cost of the investment to the net cash return on it. By their nature such calculations do not conform to the income and expenditure figures of the financial accounts, and in this context also there is no objection to a difference between presentation for accounting purposes and for investment appraisal.

- (f) The present intention is that investment grants will be payable on a quarterly basis, initially after an interval of eighteen months from submission of the claim but later after a diminishing period which will ultimately be reduced to about six months. It is to be assumed that rules will be promulgated which will clearly indicate the eligibility of the majority of claims and it would be reasonable to take credit for the amount of the expected claim in respect of capital expenditure incurred and to show the amount due as a special item under debtors. This would give the correct figure of capital employed and indicate for the information of the proprietors the amount (which may be very substantial) of claims lodged but still outstanding.

The different methods of presentation that need to be considered and the relative merits of each are as follows:

Method 1

The immediate credit of the whole of the grant to profit and loss account in the year in which the capital expenditure to which it is related is incurred (less a proportion transferred to taxation equalization account and brought back to profit and loss account over the life of the asset as an offset against the extra tax suffered by reason of the reduced writing down allowances obtained).

This method has the effect of treating what is essentially a capital receipt as a revenue item. It also distorts the amount available for distribution by including in profits a sum related to capital expenditure incurred during the year and not to the profitability of the business.

In our opinion this procedure is undesirable.

Method 2

A procedure similar to 1 except that the part of the investment grant not carried to taxation equalization account is brought to the credit of profit and loss account over the life of the asset and not in the year of receipt.

This procedure has the effect of bringing the benefit of the grants into profit and loss account over what will normally be a substantial period of time. Bearing in mind that the investment grants are intended to be variable, selective and discriminatory, it seems likely that over such a period they will reflect a number of changes in Government policy. It is undesirable, therefore, to bring the grants into the profits of later years when the factors giving rise to the allowance may have ceased to apply and when shareholders and management alike will probably have little comprehension of the reasons for the original allowances.

In these circumstances we do not favour this method of dealing with the investment grant.

Method 3

The deduction of the grant from the asset in respect of which it is received and the calculation of depreciation on the reduced figure.

This procedure is open to the objection that the reduction in the depreciation charge increases the profits of the firm during the life of the asset and, in effect, results in the profit and loss account being credited with the amount of the grant. A side effect of this may be that the benefit of the investment grant is being passed on to the shareholders by way of dividend or to the consumer as a subsidy to him in the form of lower prices, thus vitiating the purpose of the grant to stimulate investment.

Moreover, the variations which are to be expected in the rates of grant and of qualifying assets will give rise to inconsistencies and distortions in the depreciation charge if this is calculated on the net value of assets after deduction of investment grants. As a result, the benefit of investment grants will be obscured in a reduced depreciation charge, while the actual constitution of the depreciation charge will become increasingly inconsistent and incomprehensible to shareholders and management alike.

In these circumstances we do not favour this method of dealing with the grants.

A procedure similar to 3 except that the asset remains stated at its full gross cost and the investment grant is treated as initial depreciation which might possibly be shown separately in the balance sheet. Subsequent depreciation would be calculated on the full gross cost of the asset.

It is probably fair to assume that the majority of fixed assets are depreciated on a straight line basis. In such circumstances the effect of this procedure will be to relieve a business of depreciation on a fixed asset so treated in the last years of its life.

Although this procedure is preferable to Method 3 it is difficult to see that it will serve any very useful purpose. Moreover it will fail to make a clear distinction between the capital employed in a business and the sources from which that capital is derived.

In these circumstances we do not favour this procedure.

Method 5

The transfer of the grant to capital reserve (less a proportion transferred to taxation equalization account and brought back to profit and loss account over the life of the asset as an offset against the extra tax suffered by reason of the reduced writing down allowances).

This treatment of the investment grants does not seem to give rise to any of the objections applicable to the methods described above. The grant is shown as an addition to capital employed and the amount of the incentive which the company has received is clearly indicated. Asset values will be stated on a consistent basis unaffected by changes in Government policy, while the depreciation charge will not be distorted by the grants and will represent a comparable charge for every asset.

In our opinion, therefore, this last method of dealing with investment grants in the accounts of a business is preferable to the other methods described above and is the one that we would recommend for general adoption.

Minority views

While this paper reflects the views of the majority of the Research and Publications Committee it is thought advisable to record certain minority views.

Two members of the committee, while agreeing with the general conclusions above, took the view that since the grants were capital receipts no part thereof should be used to increase profit and therefore no transfers to and from taxation equalization account should be made. They were also concerned about the perpetuation of a difference in accounting procedure between companies with taxation equalization accounts and those without.

One member of the committee considered that the proposals continued an accounting convention developed for a different taxation structure which is not applicable to the grants given under the new taxation structure. He took the view that the whole grant should be deducted from the cost of the asset concerned as in Method 3 above, with the proviso that the amount of the grant should be shown separately.

How Well Does Your Company Use Money?

by J. M. S. RISK, B.Com., Ph.D., C.A., F.C.W.A., J.Dip.M.A., F.C.I.S., F.B.I.M., M.I.M.C.

THE fruitful use of money is a wide subject embracing the whole of business affairs. Accordingly in this short paper a few topics have been selected which it is hoped will prove of interest. These are:

- (1) the financial framework;
- (2) money in fixed assets;
- (3) money in stocks;
- (4) money owing by customers;
- (5) profit analysis – the fruits of using money well.

To answer the question: 'Is a company using money

A paper presented at the national conference on 'Financial Management' organized by Production Engineering Research Association (PERA) in June.

well?', one must have ways of measuring how much money is used and how well it is used. It is the aim of the various measuring rods which are given in this paper to show how a company is doing at one point of time. If these measurements are then compared with those of former periods, a movement will be revealed, showing whether a company is going uphill or downhill.

In due course standards directly relevant to the given company can be established, while present achievements can be compared with those projected for future periods.

The financial framework

The key ratio is the relationship of profits to the cash invested to earn these profits.

General pattern

A useful pattern for checking how well a company is using its money is shown by various ratios below:

Return on investment – Profit to cash invested.

Operating profitability – Profit to production.

Commercial profitability – Sales to total cost.

Sales less materials to production time.

Sales less materials to conversion cost.

Operating yardsticks –

Manufacturing cost to total costs.

Marketing costs to total costs.

Other costs to total costs.

Capital productivity – Production to net assets.

Fixed asset utilization – Production to fixed assets.

Production to manufacturing fixed assets.

Production to other fixed assets.

Sales to marketing fixed assets –

Sales to selling fixed assets.

Sales to distribution fixed assets.

Circulating asset flow speed – Production to working capital.

Production to stocks –

Material used to direct material stocks.

Production to work in progress.

Sales to finished goods.

Production to other stocks.

Production to net financial assets –

Sales to debtors.

Purchases to creditors.

It is good practice to take the average of opening and closing figures, e.g. for stocks, debtors, etc.

Structural relationships

The manner in which money has been used can be shown by relating certain figures which appear in the balance sheet.

Total money in use:

Invested money

Invested by shareholders:

Ordinary shares;

Reserves;

Total 'ordinary' funds;

Preference shares.

Invested by others:

Debenture-holders;

Other lenders.

Other finance:

Trade creditors;

Other creditors (not interest bearing).

Manner of use:

Fixed assets [analysed variously].

Current assets:

Stocks;

Debtors;

Other.

Each item to be expressed as a percentage of the total money in use.

In addition, the following 'structural ties' should be noted:

Current assets to current liabilities.

Debtors (and cash – if any) to current liabilities.

Fixed assets to shareholders' funds [=net worth].

Also:

Cash plus debtors less creditors to give 'net financial assets'.

Cash plus debtors plus stocks less creditors to give net working capital.

Debtors as a percentage of net working capital.

Stocks as a percentage of net working capital.

By watching the trend of each item given in the list of structural ratios and in the list covered by the 'general pattern', improvements in the manner in which a company uses money will be observed – or the reverse, if such be the case.

Money in fixed assets*Productive assets

Of the fixed assets some are employed in making and distributing the products while others are of an ancillary nature. If our company is to use its money wisely, we shall want to see the maximum investment in and use of profit making productive machinery and the minimum investment in the other kinds of fixed asset. So let us find out:

(1) the investment in machinery for producing and distributing the products; and

(2) the investment in other fixed assets.

Having obtained this split, let us then divide the sales or output by the sums involved, thus:

(1) Productive machinery	..	..	..	1,200
(2) Other fixed assets	..	..	..	400
				<hr/>
				£1,600
				<hr/>
				<hr/>

Hence:

$$(a) \frac{\text{Sales}}{\text{Total}} = \frac{4,800}{1,600} = 3 \text{ times.}$$

$$(b) \frac{\text{Sales}}{\text{Productive}} = \frac{4,800}{1,200} = 4 \text{ times.}$$

$$(c) \frac{\text{Sales}}{\text{Other}} = \frac{4,800}{400} = 12 \text{ times.}$$

The object should be to maximize both ratios (b) and (c). A declining trend in item (b) may indicate too heavy investment for the current level of sales leading to unused capacity, while in item (c) the object must be to achieve a continually rising ratio, even though this may be difficult because of rising levels of employee amenities, administrative equipment such as computers, and so on.

Further division

The fixed assets may be further subdivided so as to show the relationship to sales of fixed assets in:

- (1) production departments;
- (2) service departments (A), e.g. steam raising;
- (3) service departments (B), e.g. stores;
- (4) transport department;
- (5) selling, e.g. cars of sales representatives;
- (6) administration, e.g. office machinery;
- (7) occupancy: that is, land, buildings and fixtures which together provide the covered or open areas in which operations take place;
- (8) research and development.

Further 'capital turnover' ratios can be calculated so as to check whether any group of fixed assets is bearing more heavily on the volume of sales achieved. One has to keep in mind not only the money needed to acquire the assets (if not leased) but also the additional expenses of depreciation and maintenance which accompany the use of fixed assets.

Asset Utilization

While the sales figure represents broadly the use made of the money tied up in fixed assets, the sales value includes the cost of materials. If the latter expense is deleted we obtain the gross margin (or added value as it may be called). This figure may then be used as the numerator in the capital turnover ratios; that is:

$$\frac{\text{Gross margin}}{\text{Relative fixed assets}}$$

One may go further and insert in the numerator the production in physical terms, or the conversion cost (in terms of standard cost).

What we are now seeking is a measure of the extent to which money tied up in plant and machinery is being used well or badly. The most efficient and technically advanced machinery is of little use to a company if it is under-employed. So measures of capacity utilization in all functions and at all levels are useful in showing where money is not being put to use with sufficient intensity.

Money in stocks

It is usually assumed that stock will vary with changes in the volume of production and sales. This assumption is a useful one and a number of stock turnover ratios can usefully be calculated and the trend watched to detect abnormal changes. (Some of these ratios were described in a paper by the author published in Management Accounting for November 1965.)

It is, however, to be noted that such ratios usually refer to past conditions and events, whereas stocks held at the present time exist to satisfy the conditions of the future.

It is often found that a small number of items (the 'A' items) account for a large proportion of the total value of all stocks. A rather larger number of items (the 'B' items) cover an important part of the total, while the remaining items (the 'C' items) are large in number but account for only a small portion of the total. The distribution may be somewhat along the following lines:

				Number Per cent	Value Per cent
A items	..	..	..	10	70
B items	..	..	..	15	25
C items	..	..	..	75	5
				100	100

It follows that if one can reduce the holdings of stocks which fall within the 'A' category, there is a good chance of effecting substantial reductions in the total amount of cash tied up in the stocks.

How high a premium?

The natural desire not to allow production to be halted through lack of raw material or purchased components may lead to rather a high premium being paid in the form of buffer stocks.

If one were to examine the history of movements in the 'A' type of stocks, it would be informative to find out whether the actual level of stock holding ever reached zero and whether in that case there was a hold-up in production.

It is suggested that a careful short-term forecast of 'A' type stocks (individual items) against present holdings and in conjunction with current lead times may indicate the possibility of reducing the present level of safety margins.

What does it cost to be out of stock? If the stock consists of finished goods, one may lose business – now and in the future. If, however, it is raw material one is considering, the maximum loss might be considered as being the total fixed expense of the business divided by the number of working days in the year – in accounting jargon: one day's under-recovery of fixed overheads. One might also introduce the estimated loss of one day's profit.

If, however, it is only part of the pipeline in which the flow stops, the potential loss may be appreciably less than the calculation just suggested.

If the value of all stock items at minimum level were added up, it would no doubt come to a substantial sum and a considerable part of the total stock value. Is such sum a current asset or a fixed asset? Even though the material could possibly be sold, is the money tied up in it a permanent fixture? Is such stock more of a fixed asset than any 'fixed asset'? – for fixed assets are depreciated year by year and are eventually written off, while cash tied up in minimum stock levels continues indefinitely to be frozen.

Indirect materials

Supplies of maintenance materials and replacement parts may well be included under the heading of current assets, but these items also may represent cash tied up almost permanently. Need it be so or to the extent which was desirable when it was not so easy to obtain supplies?

Consider the tanks of fuel oil or dumps of coal kept in reserve for use in the power house in the event of supplies drying up. Have they been broached during the last ten years? If not, are they current or fixed assets? Is the premium too high?

Perhaps stocks should be re-analysed so as to show the cost of minimum stocks and permanent holdings of indirect materials separately from the other items. One would then recognize the financial cost of money frozen inside the business. Stock turnover ratios could be re-calculated after eliminating the 'fixed-current' assets.

Where feasible, stock turnover ratios for different product groups should be calculated. It may be that profit differentials are in need of review so as to reflect the extra money absorbed in certain product ranges.

Money owing by customers

Credit control starts before credit is granted to a customer. However, once this has been done, one needs instruments for measuring the extent of credit taken and one needs to know whether such credit is within acceptable limits.

There are various types of measurement. A common method is to express the total outstanding debts in terms of the sales days represented. For example, if sales for a year are £200, and amounts owing at the end of the year come to £50, it will quickly be seen that the equivalent of three months' (average) sales are outstanding.

Example

$$\frac{£50}{£200} \times 12 \text{ (months)} = 3 \text{ months; or}$$

$$\frac{£50}{£200} \times 100 = 25 \text{ per cent; or}$$

$$\frac{£200}{£50} = 4 \text{ times (turnover rate).}$$

But the sales of £200 relate to a year, starting twelve months ago. It would be a sorry state of affairs if the outstanding debts contained any part of the sales of the early months of the year. So another method in use is to express the debtors of £50 as a percentage of, say, the previous three months' sales. If the latter are found to be £100 (because of a strong seasonal pattern), the debts now become 50 per cent of the last three months' sales.

A refinement is to calculate the figure at two dates: (1) at the month end, and (2) a week to ten days later, by which time much of the money owing at the end of the month has been received. For example, if £30 had been received out of the £50 due at the month end, the balance would be £20, now representing only 20 per cent of the previous three months' sales. A similar kind of adjustment may be made for the other modes of expression.

Naturally, separate sets of figures may be kept for different groups of customers: e.g. home and export; or ordinary trade and Government departments; and so on.

The outstanding debts may be shown according to the number of months they are outstanding: e.g. £50 outstanding in total:

Total	One month	Two months	Three months	Over three months
£50	£30	£10	£6	£4
100	60	20	12	8
per cent	per cent	per cent	per cent	per cent

Control limits

While the above methods are helpful, a more accurate method may be employed subject to slightly more work in calculating the measurements. The method is appropriate where the accounts can be 'aged' and there is a good degree of similarity of pattern in the size of customer accounts and paying habits, with no change in the terms of payment offered.

The following table reduces the arithmetic to the minimum so that the procedure may be understood, but it must be emphasized that the number of periods on which the calculations should be based will probably cover a period of two years or more.

Month	Sales £	Cumulative Collections
		in month of sale per cent	by two months later per cent
1	400	50	99
2	500	46	97
		96	196
	Average	48	98

Squares of deviations from averages
2	4	1
	Sum of squares ..	8
	Divided by number of items gives	4
	Square root thereof	2

The last line of figures shows the standard deviation of the arrays of percentages shown as the cumulative collections in respect of each month's sales. Provided the conditions mentioned earlier as to similarity of pattern etc. are observed, one may decide on control limits within which the cumulative collections in respect of any one month's sales should fall. For example, if one sets the control limits at twice the standard deviation, the limits would be as follows:

Upper limit		Per cent	Per cent
Average ..	..	48	98
Add Twice std dev. ..	..	4	2
		52	100
Lower limit		Per cent	Per cent
Average ..	..	48	98
Less Twice std dev. ..	..	4	2
		44	96

Actual collections as percentages of the respective monthly sales can be plotted on a control chart on which lines have been drawn to show the upper and lower control limits. Action is then indicated if any point falls outside these limits. Whether the above method or some simpler device is employed will depend on the value of the information in each case, but it is certainly desirable to relate amounts outstanding to the sales which gave rise to them.

Profit analysis

It we are to use our company's money wisely, we must try to ensure that each pound pays its way. We do not want a few very profitable products supporting a long tail of mediocre or unprofitable lines. This may seem obvious, yet sometimes less attention is given to the matter than may be warranted.

On occasion it may be quite simple to analyse sales and profits by product groups and so to see where further investigation is needed, either to make the product profitable or to eliminate it from the range.

Product costs

Much has been written on the question of the inclusion or otherwise of overheads in product costs. While marginal costs have many uses, it takes more than a quantity of raw material and some (variable) direct labour to make a product: machines and equipment are almost invariably involved and to suggest that finished products can be conjured out of the air without passing through the operations and processes essential for their production seems to be shutting one's eyes to the facts of life. If machines are needed, then there is a cost to bear; and no doubt other costs equally valid. In other words, marginal costs are but part of the story.

But it would be equally wrong to argue that all the money disbursed by a company each year is essential for the making of the products sold in the year. Two questions help as guide-lines:

- (1) Can the product be made even if some item of expense is not incurred? If so, exclude it from product costs.

[This will thus segregate much expense of the distribution, selling and (general) administration type.]

- (2) Can the products delivered to customers this year be made without the expense? If so, rule it out.

[This will segregate certain kinds of research and development expenditure: that incurred for next year's products, and next year's processes.]

It is, of course, recognized that selling prices should be adequate to cover all expense of whatever kind deemed necessary for the survival and prosperity of the company.

In addition to marginal product costs and the resulting marginal 'profit' or 'contribution', one should have product costs which, in general, include factory overhead expenditure.

Limiting factors

When any factor is in short supply, it is helpful to express profitability in terms of the use of that factor. For example, if some material is scarce, the profit per unit of that material will help to direct attention to the most profitable product mix.

Often it is some factor affecting production or distribution capacity which is in short supply: e.g. skilled labour, or machine capacity. In this case, the difference between the selling price and the cost of materials (including components purchased fully made) provides a balance which we may term the 'gross margin'. This amount, expressed as an amount per hour of production time, provides a useful yardstick of product profitability, that is:

$$\frac{\text{Sales price less material content}}{\text{Production hours}}$$

The denominator may be the standard hours of work needed to make the product, or it may be direct wage hours paid, or direct wages, or it may be machine or process hours. (For the business as a whole, the number of working days may be used.)

If there is some bottleneck process, or operation, the gross margin may be expressed in relation to an hour's 'bottleneck' time.

Incidence of machinery

If all work were done by hand, the gross margin per hour of work needed would be suitable, but when products pass through a variety of processes some of which use expensive equipment and others not so, one should consider introducing a further element to allow for this factor. Instead of direct wages (at actual or standard rates), a machine-hour rate or process-hour rate is needed; indeed, a rate for each section through which the products pass. The ratio now becomes:

$$\frac{\text{Sales price less material content}}{\text{Time} \times \text{hourly rates}}$$

The denominator is now equivalent to the factory cost of production after excluding the material content of the product. This gives the cost of converting the raw material into the finished product, and so we may use the term conversion cost, thus:

$$\frac{\text{Gross margin}}{\text{Conversion cost}}$$

Incidence of marketing costs

If all products are sent to all areas, the incidence of marketing expenses may not be of great importance as between one product and another. Where this is not so, and if the information can be provided, one would like to know the gross margin obtained in relation to the sum of conversion and marketing costs relative to each product or product group.

This calculation would take into account differing terms of trade, channels of distribution, home and export trade; indeed, any element of expense which varies significantly from one product to another.

Conclusion

Though companies vary widely in the nature of their products, their processes, their markets, and their scale of operations, ultimately all their results and their current standing can be shown in terms of money.

It is important that a company should be aware of the manner in which investors' money is used and whether successfully or not; and whether the company is in a state of equilibrium or not.

It is believed that the measurements suggested in this paper will go a considerable way towards answering the question: 'How well does your company use money?'

It is not too much to assert that ultimately the prosperity of the country as well as the well-being of each one of us depends on the extent to which every company can achieve a favourable answer to this question.

MANAGEMENT INFORMATION

Fundamental Research

AT the present time, when the need for technological change is being recognized from Government level downwards, many companies must be debating whether and to what extent they should initiate a research programme; research here being taken to mean fundamental research, as distinct from applied research which is involved in putting into production and following up specific projects.

The starting point for any decision on whether or not to mount a programme of fundamental research should be an appraisal of the overall objectives of the company. Until management has defined those objectives, little consideration can be given to the use of research in the business or the allocation of funds for that purpose (see The Accountant, July 2nd; 'Allocation of funds in a dynamic enterprise').

Some of the company's objectives may be capable of achievement without the need of any further research. Other objectives may appear difficult or incapable of achievement without any further contribution of scientific knowledge. The company must then decide what particular contributions it needs from science to achieve those objectives and 'select disciplines, staff the programme and develop its organization to best achieve these purposes'.<sup>1</sup>

This appraisal of company objectives should enable management to delineate the particular areas of research that must be pursued, but must not be so specific as to inhibit investigation of other possibilities that may emerge in the course of the programme. Many important scientific discoveries have been made in the course of work on quite unrelated problems.

From the foregoing it can be seen that fundamental research is not appropriate to all businesses. If the company can achieve its objectives without research, there is little point in allocating funds for this purpose. Research merely to promote a 'with-it' image can be a purposeless and costly procedure. It must always be remembered that research can give no certainty of contributing new products but provides only the possibility that new products may emerge.

What a research programme will contribute to a company is a fund of new ideas from which the company can select as required, together with a group of specialists whose knowledge and advice can be called upon as and when required, and who will give the company an awareness of what is happening in areas of science which concern the company and provide some protection against competitors 'leap-frogging' in technical know-how.

Fundamental research may be of two kinds: (a) research designed to ensure the competitiveness of existing products in the future; and (b) research designed to project the company beyond the present boundaries of knowledge into completely new fields. In the case of support for existing products it must be borne in mind that changes may not always come from the traditional areas of science related to that product, e.g. it was polymer research and not agricultural research that has revolutionized textiles.

'To see its true technological opportunities and threats, a company should look at its products and processes as sets of performance characteristics, not just assemblies of specific component parts. It must ask itself how these characteristics might conceivably be provided by any given field of science.' (Ibid., page 116.)

In the field of more general research, the problem is more difficult. Here the company is endeavouring to expand its knowledge into completely unknown fields. Research of this type is not for the company without adequate resources and patience to see a programme through despite uncertainty that the results of that research will be usable.

Having laid down the programme of research in broad terms, managements' function is to ensure that the right type of people are engaged and that as far as possible the research effort is not merely duplicating similar effort by competitors. At the same time there should be adequate communication and co-operation between research staff, marketing, and applied research to ensure a proper orientation of ideas and follow-through to the product.

Cost control

Because of the imprecise nature of the work done, fundamental research is a charge on general company funds; the way in which those funds are allocated will be determined by general company objectives and designed to maximize the possibilities of achieving those objectives. Within that overall allocation of funds, management will select the major programmes of research to be followed and will try to ensure that the researchers are aware of the company's long-term needs.

Control of costs of research presents a major problem.<sup>2</sup> Budgets can be prepared to ensure that overall expenditure is kept within predetermined limits. Since, however, most of the work being carried out will provide no material return to the company it is impossible to measure in any way the cost/return relationship on any individual project in the programme. Moreover those ideas which are eventually worth while may emerge only over a number of years' research, and so are not readily susceptible to a form of current control.

This does not mean that any idea of control should be abandoned altogether. If the right kind of inquiring mind is employed on the research programme, there will be a quite laudable tendency for knowledge to be pursued for its own sake, irrespective of the company's needs. This means that there must be periodic reviews of all projects in the programme to ensure that they are still relevant to the company's requirements. At some stage most of the projects will have to be abandoned because of lack of results, and it is important that this cut-off should come sooner rather than later, so that resources are continually directed to the most promising lines of investigation instead of being dispersed over too many projects.

Securities Acceptable to the Lending Banker

Second edition, by L. C. MATHER, B.COM., F.C.I.S., F.I.B.
Waterlow & Sons Ltd, London. 35s net.

Paget has always been a substantial book, and this latest edition, enlarged, as the editor tells us, by a fuller treatment of the topic of land as security for bank lending, is more substantial still. It takes in, of course, the more recent cases on banking law, including notably the Hedley Byrne and the U.D.T. v. Kirkwood decisions (although unfortunately the judgments of the Court of Appeal in the latter, which 'cannot be regarded as anything but startling', came too late for 'any proper consideration of them in this edition'). Paget is the lawyer's book on banking law; it must obviously be also the reference book for other callings that have to deal with banking.

The new Thomson Dictionary also takes account of recent developments in banking, over a wider front than the purely legal. The new material is efficiently incorporated, but it would be a good thing if next time a more thorough purge were made of older material. There are appendices on Scottish banking and Irish land laws in their relation to banking, contributed respectively by C. J. Shimmins and F. C. King.

Mr Mather's high office in banking is assurance that all his writings are essentially practical, and the new edition of his book on bank securities gives a clear picture of the banker's problems, and so at one remove his customer's.

Terence's tag, Quot homines tot sententiae, might be applied most appositely to the problems of share valuations. This was strikingly demonstrated in the Holt v. C.I.R. case of 1953 in which a cloud of expert witnesses gave widely differing opinions on the worth of a shipping company's shares for estate duty purposes. The executors had originally suggested a figure of 11s 3d. The Estate Duty Office countered with 20s net. The executors then proposed 12s 6d. The Estate Duty Office took a long look and a deep breath and murmured 60s net. After both sides had advanced and retired a few times, the Estate Duty Office arrived at a final figure of 34s against the executors' ultimate 17s 2d. Each of these valuations was recommended by a chartered accountant. Lord Danckwerts, who conducted the subsequent case, made 'the most intelligent guess' he could after a masterly analysis of the arguments submitted and valued the shares at 19s net.

It is not surprising, therefore, that few authorities have committed themselves to paper on this subject but the gap has been notably filled by a new book written by Mr Hamilton Baynes as the first of a series to be produced by the publishers on certain aspects of accounting and administration. He considers, in commendable detail, the legal and accounting rules and the conventions to be observed when valuing a business in the form of a private limited company and quotes widely from reported law cases, from opinions expressed by the councils of the Stock Exchange and other bodies and from the financial Press. Throughout, he insists that share valuation is a task for the expert and that the officials of the Estate Duty Office (a party to most disputes which reach the Courts) certainly come within this category. This makes it all the more important that those advising the other side should be well informed and as it is very often a practising accountant who is called upon to give this advice, Mr Hamilton Baynes has designed his book with the express intention of helping his professional colleagues. The quality of his observations and the breadth of his survey are such, however, that he deserves, and will no doubt get, an even wider readership to include stock-brokers, solicitors, bankers and, almost certainly, officials of the Estate Duty Office.

Principles of Auditing

by the late F. R. M. DE PAULA, C.B.E., F.C.A.

Thirteenth edition by F. CLIVE DE PAULA, T.D., F.C.A., F.C.W.A., M.I.M.C.

Sir Isaac Pitman & Sons Ltd, London. 40s net.

There are two books, in particular, on the subject of auditing which over the years have rightly come to be regarded as standard works on the philosophy, as well as the practical rules, of the profession. One of these is Dicksee's Auditing, in its way a unique publication, and the other is de Paula's Principles of Auditing which has enabled many a student to find a philosophy in professional work early in his training. It was no doubt difficult to decide to publish a new edition in view of the prospect of a new Companies Bill, but the approach and the philosophy of auditing are by no means static and considerable changes have taken place over the last decade which fully justify this new revised edition by the son of the author.

There are many good things in this book. Early in the text the internal control questionnaire is mentioned and this is linked with detailed comment in each appropriate section of the internal control questionnaire. There is a chapter, and a separate internal control questionnaire section for the audit of computer systems and in many other sections the march of progress in auditing and accounting is reflected. Nevertheless, it is in the sections dealing with published accounts and the layout of the detailed accounts and balance sheet that the relationship between accountant and client emerges most clearly. It was in presentation of accounts that the late F. R. M. de Paula was pre-eminent in his own day, and deservedly so.

Selected recommendations and notes on auditing of the English Institute are appended, together with the Eighth Schedule to the Companies Act 1948, recommendations of the London Stock Exchange and a specimen of published accounts.

Company Law

by KENNETH SMITH, M.SC.(ECON.), PH.D., A.C.C.S., F.S.S., and DENIS J. KEENAN, LL.B.(HONS.), A.C.I.S., D.M.A.

Sir Isaac Pitman & Sons Ltd, London. 30s net.

This work is a companion volume to the authors' English Law and Essentials of Mercantile Law and is designed for students taking the intermediate and final examinations of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants, The Chartered Institute of Secretaries, and The Corporation of Secretaries. As Mr Smith is head of the Department of Commerce and Management at the Mid-Essex Technical College and School of Art, and Mr Keenan is principal lecturer in Law at the same Department, the authors are well fitted to their task.

The first 185 pages of text of the new work take the student through the many aspects of company law from the promotion and incorporation of the company to winding up, but omit detailed treatment of Schedule 8 to the Companies Act 1948, on the view that this is better dealt with as part of a course in accounting. The next seventy-five pages (Appendix A) contain extended summaries of cases which are numbered consecutively and are referred to in the text by name and number. In this way the cases can be studied independently of the text after the student has obtained a general grasp of the narrative. A fairly short Appendix B sets out the main recommendations of the Company Law Committee (the 'Jenkins Report').

The work is clearly and concisely written and combines a friendly approach with adequate depth of treatment.

Professional Men – The Rise of the Professional Classes in Nineteenth-century England

by W. J. READER

Weidenfeld & Nicolson, London. 36s net.

Whatever may be said against competitive examinations as a means of selection, it is preferable to the rule of patronage, purchase and nepotism which existed in Britain until the middle of the last century. The reform was begun by the East India Co in 1832 and was furthered by the appearance, in 1854, of a 'Report on the organization of the permanent Civil Service' written by Sir Stafford Northcote and Sir Charles Trevelyan for a committee set up under the chairmanship of the historian, Macaulay, to investigate the possibilities of this new method. Similar reforms were adopted by the army, medicine and the law and, of the great professions today, only the church still adheres to the policy of preferment.

Mr Reader examines at length the conditions which obtained before this salutary social revolution took place and gives much interesting and out-of-the-way information about the conditions in which patronage flourished and how it was exercised. His theme is based on the remark by Cobden in 1845 that 'the aristocracy of this country have the army, the navy, the colonies, and a large amount of expenditure, at their disposal' and he demonstrates, too, the strong class distinctions which existed within the various professions themselves – for example, the difficulties of the poor clergymen without 'interest'; the gulfs between physicians, surgeons and apothecaries; and the superiority of barristers over attorneys and solicitors.

One of the chief criticisms made at the time against examinations as a criterion of suitability was that while they might identify intellectual qualities they did not take into account character and morals. Also, doubts were expressed on the adverse effect the competitive system might have on the health of candidates. In the event, the idea worked well if slowly at first and entry to such emergent professions as accountancy, engineering and surveying was similarly regulated in the second half of the century. Now nearly a hundred years later, thanks to other civilizing influences, what Hilaire Belloc called 'the accursed power which stands on privilege' is finally on the way out.

Accounting Staff Training Schemes in the Port of London Authority

by JOHN LUNCH, V.R.D., F.C.A., M.INST.T.

Director of Finance and Commerce, Port of London Authority

THE challenge of modern business with the rapid expansion of new accounting techniques places an increasing demand on the breadth of experience of the chartered accountant in industry or commerce. The training of the articled clerk should therefore include wherever possible a period of experience to enable him to appreciate these problems and obtain a working knowledge of new accounting equipment and methods. It is to meet this need that the special provisions for industrial experience are included in the Institute's regulations for service under articles. The methods by which a training scheme was set up in the Port of London Authority will be of interest to those responsible for training programmes in industry and to those responsible for articled clerks seconded to industry for practical experience.

During the past four years the Authority has undertaken the development of modern management accounting methods. At the same time much work has been placed on the computer. This has entailed a considerable reorganization of the accounting structure and the plan for the financial and economic staff provides for a doubling of senior staff and the halving of junior staff over a period of a few years.

Three schemes

To meet these extensive senior staff requirements it was considered essential to institute an accounting staff training scheme which would afford junior staff opportunities for advancement. In 1964 therefore a senior accountant was appointed accounting training officer to set up and administer a training programme. It was decided that there should be three categories of scheme and briefly these are as follows:

Scheme A: This scheme provides an opportunity for, initially, twelve particularly promising men or women to obtain an accountancy or other approved qualification after completion of a carefully designed training period covering all aspects of the accounting function.

Scheme B: Under this scheme financial assistance is given to staff, who, in addition to their normal duties successfully complete a course of study for an accountancy qualification.

Scheme C: Under this scheme approximately four hundred members of the accounting staff have attended a three-day course of instruction at the City of London College specially designed to provide an outline knowledge of accounting techniques.

The aim of these schemes has been to stimulate the accounting staff with enthusiasm to master new techniques and seize the new opportunities which have arisen. Scheme C has fulfilled a useful purpose in creating a general awareness among the staff of the accounting requirements of a modern business. Of the four hundred who have attended these courses, twenty-five have undertaken courses of study in their spare time under Scheme B and on successful completion their study fees will be refunded to them by the Authority.

Scheme A was initiated in 1964 when twelve trainees were selected by interview. The criteria for selection were that candidates should show management potential, a high degree of ability to benefit from practical training, determination to complete their chosen academic or professional course, and should have passed or been exempted from the appropriate preliminary examination. Candidates have to undertake to complete a course of study in their spare time and normally up to fifteen hours study per week is recommended.

The choice of qualification is left to the individual and currently trainees are studying for B.Sc.(Econ.), certified accountant, and cost and works accountant qualifications (alas, because articles must be served in a practising firm, the Authority cannot train students to be chartered accountants).

Fees and expenses defrayed

The Authority defrays the costs of study courses and necessary textbooks. In addition, examination entrance fees are paid and also any travelling expenses incurred by the trainee as a result of the scheme are refunded.

It was decided that each trainee should have an individual programme of practical training to ensure that as far as possible the experience gained should be orientated to the particular qualification for which he was studying. The Authority's Economics Section has therefore retained economics trainees for a longer period than is normally the case for accountancy trainees.

The five-year programme has been drafted to ensure that each trainee shall serve at least three periods of six months in the dock accounting offices and also one period of three months working in a dock operating department as a junior member of the traffic staff. Recently this operating experience has been extended to include a further period of three months in the dock engineering departments.

The aim is to give each trainee a broad experience of dock accounting practice and this includes the calculation of charges for the handling of goods and the berthing of ships, preparation of revenue and expenditure statements for operating departments, and a knowledge of dock operating methods.

Experience given in management accounting

When the trainee returns to head office he is given wide experience in up-to-date management accounting techniques. It will be of interest to quote a number of examples. The financial and economic assessment of capital expenditure using discounted cash flow techniques is carried out in the Development Section as are also costings on handling commodities in order to relate charges to costs. The Economics and Statistics Section assists in marketing research, compiles and interprets statistics, analyses trends and makes trade forecasts. In conjunction with trained work study and operational research teams, accountants provide the necessary financial data to build the mathematical models which simulate real-life situations, to obtain optimum economic benefit. In addition, the Authority's Systems Section provides scope for broad experience of the review of clerical systems and data processing and programming on the computer. Management Accounting provides budgets and management control information. Collection of funds, investment portfolio management and taxation problems are handled by Financial Accounting. Such a breadth of experience in sophisticated accounting techniques is of course only possible in a large organization.

During his training each trainee prepares a report every six months detailing the progress of his studies and his practical work, and giving his impressions on the training programme. This is reinforced by reports from the secondment department on the individual trainee.

Shortly prior to the professional examinations some correspondence colleges arrange a series of special pre-examination lectures which the trainees can attend as part of their two weeks' pre-examination leave of absence to complete their final revision studies.

The training schemes are being continuously developed and currently plans are being made to expand their scope by the use of films on port management, special accounting papers to be given by senior staff and the institution of exchange schemes with large industrial organizations and professional firms of accountants.

By such broadening of views it is considered that the greatest development of the management potential of the accounting staff can be achieved.

From the schemes, the Authority will gain a steady flow of accountants who have not only the technical professional knowledge but also a detailed working experience of dock operations. Thereby the future financial management succession of the Authority is safeguarded and the staff requirements for the development of the accounting function are achieved.

Complications

IF the complications of corporation tax and overspill relief were not enough, there had to be devaluation of the Indian rupee to complicate the accounts of McLeod Russel & Co Ltd which provide this week's reprint. As the notes to the accounts show, the company, originally an agency group, is also now the holding company for a number of British-owned Indian tea estate concerns and several take-over operations were not finally completed at the accounting date, although the accounts are drawn up on a completion basis.

Explaining the relatively heavy taxation charge in the accounts, the chairman, Sir George MacKinlay, points out that the subsidiaries continued to be treated as overseas trade corporations for tax purposes until April 5th last and for that reason, and because for tax saving purposes, dividends were paid by the new subsidiaries to their former shareholders before March 31st, 1966, the computation of the tax liability has been a complicated matter.

In addition a loss sustained by one of the subsidiaries, which was in excess of the profit earned by another (that profit being set off against an accumulated past loss), resulted in a slightly higher overall charge for Indian taxation than would otherwise have been the case if Indian legislation had permitted the system of subvention payments permissible in Britain.

Overspill relief

In computing tax liabilities overspill relief, to which the company will become entitled in respect of 1966-67, has not been taken into account. In the case of some subsidiaries only, the relief will be calculated by reference to the dividends paid in the current year out of the profits of the year covered by these accounts. In the cases of other subsidiaries, relief due for 1966-67 will depend on divi-

AUDITORS' REPORT ON ACCOUNTS

TO THE MEMBERS OF MCLEOD RUSSEL &amp; CO., LIMITED

We have examined the annexed balance sheet and have obtained all the information and explanations which we considered necessary for our audit.

In our opinion proper books of account have been kept by the company and the balance sheet, together with the note on page [above], which is in agreement therewith, complies with the Companies Act 1948 and gives a true and fair view of the state of the company's affairs at 31st March, 1966.

We have also examined the consolidated accounts of the company and its subsidiaries with the audited accounts of those companies, none of which has been audited by us, in our opinion the consolidated balance sheet and consolidated profit and loss account, together with the relevant notes on pages [347-8-9], comply with the Companies Act 1948, and respectively give a true and fair view of the state of affairs at 31st March, 1966 and of the profit for the year ended on that date of the company and its subsidiaries so far as concerns the members of the company and so far as is practicable having regard to the fact that the accounts of the subsidiaries are made up to 31st December, 1965.

dends which may be paid before April 5th, 1967, out of the current year's profits.

In the circumstances it was thought best to ignore overspill relief altogether for the purposes of these accounts. It has been calculated, however, that on the basis of a repetition, in 1966, of 1965 profits, and if the same dividends were paid by the subsidiaries, the relief would be of the order of £23,700.

The devaluation of the Indian rupee from 13'33 to 21 rupees to the £ inevitably had widespread implications for a company with practically the whole of its business linked with India. The most serious immediate effect is the human one of the position of British estate managers and expatriate staff of the company's Calcutta agents. Ways and means of meeting the serious situation confronting some of the company's personnel are being considered.

Devaluation

Obviously so far as the company's finances are concerned, to the extent to which subsidiaries have a surplus of net current assets in India, a loss on devaluation will have been sustained in sterling terms. In reverse cases there will have been a notional gain.

These differences will fall to be dealt with in the current year's accounts but the balances of 1965 profits of the subsidiaries, to the extent to which they are needed for payment of dividends and which cannot be remitted until the current year's income tax assessments in India have been completed, will have to be remitted at the new exchange rate.

Fixed assets have been revalued in recent years in terms of a 1s 6d rupee, and it is considered too early to say whether or not it will be necessary to make any changes in sterling values. The values presently adopted are known to be below current replacement values even at the new exchange parity.

For the time being, therefore, retention of the old sterling figures is considered justified. As the balance sheet shows, there are capital reserves which, if necessary, can be used to write down the values of the estates.

Forgings competition

SALES of £3,855,771 against £3,776,848, and pre-tax profits of £281,836 against £323,897, are the items which catch the eye in the combined directors' report and profit and loss account of Mitchell Somers Ltd. Such a combined report and account is unusual, though by no means exceptional.

Behind the profit performance lies a position which, however, may seem unusual in these days of price freezing. Competition in the forgings industry, in which Mitchell Somers operates, has apparently enforced its own price freeze.

The company, says Mr F. J. Somers, the chairman, is 'in the unfortunate position of having to sell its products at the same average prices as those ruling in 1958, whilst having to absorb increased costs of every kind'.

This state of affairs will continue while world capacity for producing forgings is in excess of demand. Although efforts to combat this position are going on continuously, Mr Somers clearly does not see any prospect of early improvement. In fact he considers it his duty to warn shareholders that 'the profit for the year 1966-67 will be severely affected'.

The above ten-year profit record for the Group has been compiled on the assumption that The Gingia Tea Co., Limited, Halem Tea Co., Limited, The British Assam Tea Co., Limited, Bengal United Tea Co., Limited, Cachar and Dooars Tea Co., Limited and The Hunwal Tea Co., Limited, were subsidiaries of McLeod Russel & Co., Limited throughout the period, although in the case of the Gingia, Halem and British Assam Companies they did not in fact become subsidiaries until the final acceptance of the Offers made to the shareholders of these Companies on 27th November, 1964. In the case of the Bengal United, Cachar and Dooars and The Hunwal Companies they did not in fact become subsidiaries until the final acceptance of the Offers made to the shareholders of these companies on 11th February, 1966. In order that the comparisons may not be vitiated, the commissions payable by The Gingia Tea Co., Limited, Halem Tea Co., Limited and The British Assam Tea Co., Limited to McLeod Russel & Co., Limited have been included as income of the parent company and as charges of the subsidiaries against the profits arising from tea manufacture.

CITY NOTES

HAVING been curtly reminded of the facts of life by the Imperial Chemical Industries' half-year report, the industrial equity market has lost the sense of tentative recovery which absence of bad news had given it. Even taking I.C.I.'s special position into account, the market could not overlook the fact that, on the same day as I.C.I.'s statement, there were similar offerings by a number of other front rank companies.

While not so dire in tone as I.C.I.'s, they were nevertheless disheartening enough for a market which was desperately seeking encouragement from somewhere. The point taken was that I.C.I.'s was the only report of the bunch to project the view ahead. The others were mainly reporting on the first half of the year when the squeeze at its present intensity was not in operation.

It is clear, all the same, that the equity market is now in a position where lower prices will come about by fact rather than sentiment. Small investor sentiment at present is inclined towards the view that the current pitch of prices offers buying opportunities. But facts will probably show in the next few months that the small investor, not for the first time, has managed to get his timing wrong. In index terms the market still has some way to fall.

THE I.C.I. £60 million loan stock operation will be a decided test of current interest rate conditions. The stock will be an open public offer and I.C.I.'s name will, in all probability, be enough to attract a good degree of support. But the test will be whether bigger investors see their way clear to apply for stock on the prospectus terms, on the assumption that they will not get it on an underwriting basis. It remains to be seen whether this issue marks the top of the interest rate rise. Some doubt is being voiced on that score.

* * * *

THE ranks of the jobbers on the London Stock Exchange are gradually thinning. Two more firms are closing down, one in the gilt-edged market and one in industrial shares. Inadequate turnover, rising costs, rising age of partners and cramped finances, provide a combination of problems which are extremely difficult to overcome under present conditions. The selective employment tax has been a final deciding straw. This trend seems likely to continue in the jobbing sphere, while in stockbroking the number of mergers is likely to increase before the end of the current stock exchange financial year.

THE decision of the Council of the Building Societies Association to put off until January 1st the increase in mortgage rates which would have come into operation at the beginning of next month, was clearly a compromise. But the Council has made it plain that the evil day has only been postponed. The old problem remains. Either the societies increase their rates and thereby have funds available to lend, or they keep rates as they are and have to turn away business for lack of funds.

A rate of  $4\frac{1}{4}$  per cent, tax paid, to investors would require a mortgage rate of  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent to provide an adequate operational margin, however, and the building societies are a shade wary of pricing themselves out of business. Not that borrowers are concerned with the interest rate as such. They are merely concerned with getting a mortgage and being able to afford the monthly repayments.

The Financial Function in Business

SIR, - I found Mr M. Gordon Wright's article 'The Financial Function in Business' (September 10th issue) to be an interesting analysis of the accountant's role in industry but I think some of the points he made should not be allowed to pass without comment.

Firstly, when discussing the measurement of return on capital employed he suggested that with the advent of corporation tax the after tax figure of profit is now to be preferred when judging the efficiency of management in making the best use of the resources for which it is responsible. I must confess that I cannot see how a change in the system of taxing business profits has in any way altered the situation - managements are as powerless as ever to influence the Government's spending and taxation policy and they have absolutely no power to resist any change in the rate of company tax - be it corporation tax or the old-fashioned income and profits taxes. Even the introduction of investment grants in place of the investment allowances may not eliminate fluctuations from year to year in the level of taxable profits. I still have to be convinced that the before tax profit figure has ceased to be the more valid test of managerial effectiveness.

Secondly, whilst dealing with capital investment, he writes 'This will involve some method of appraisal (preferably D.C.F.) of each new project before it is made...'. I would not disagree with him that many firms have paid all too little attention to appraisal techniques, but I think it is worth commenting that there are many situations where D.C.F. methods are an unnecessary sophistication because of the obviousness of the decision, or simpler ones are quite adequate for the particular project in mind. What is probably of greater importance is that the thinking behind the basic assumptions should be of the highest quality.

Lastly, in relation to debt ratios Mr Wright comments 'British companies - with some notable exceptions - tend to let this figure drift without real control'. If this is true, then it is indeed an indictment of British accountants - but under present-day economic conditions I rather doubt that it is.

Yours faithfully,

DESMOND GOCH, F.A.C.C.A., A.M.B.I.M.

The Productivity Problem

SIR, - One can fully sympathize with the views expressed by your correspondent R. J. Blackadder, C.A. (August 26th issue), concerning the emphasis by the Press, radio and TV on sporting events during the summer, while the country's parlous economic position receives comparatively scant attention.

However, even though this may be so, surely we need not feel quite so critical of this attitude. The daily and weekly 'heavies' have afforded ample coverage to the important matters occupying our minds and anyone watching television regularly could not have failed to be impressed by the quantity and quality of the current affairs programmes dealing with the economic situation.

One must feel thankful that in the midst of all the gloom and despondency affecting our nation, that a very considerable and heartening event took place, namely, the World Cup from which England emerged worthy victors. It is open to doubt, of course, whether this victory will have any practical effect in relation to productivity, but it certainly cheered us all immensely. Let us at least be thankful for that!

Yours faithfully,

TREVOR BOLTON, A.C.A.

The Selective Employment Tax

SIR, - I read with interest in The Accountant of September 3rd, the letter dated August 12th, 1966, from the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the President of the Institute, relative to selective employment tax and the accountancy profession. One wonders what sort of dream world the Civil Servants who write such letters live in.

We are told that one of the objects of the selective employment tax is to redress the balance between the services, which have hitherto been lightly taxed, and manufacturing which has for a long time been subject to excise duties and the purchase tax.

The point is, of course, that the manufacturing industries have always provided much higher profits and incomes than the service industries and have, therefore, quite rightly been more heavily taxed. After all I cannot afford the large houses, large cars, yachts and seaside bungalows which my friends in commerce and industry appear to regard as their right.

If, however, it is now indicated that they are to be equally taxed, then it is quite clear what action must be taken, namely, that the incomes of the service industries must be brought more into line with those of commerce and industry and we must see to it that our fees and charges are increased accordingly. The Government cannot complain that this is contrary to their prices and incomes policy, for after all they cannot have it both ways.

Yours faithfully,

Peterborough.

J. G. MEDCALF, F.C.A.

D.C.F. or P.V.?

SIR, — Your correspondent, Robert G. H. Nelson (September 3rd issue) asks for comments on the ranking of projects by net present value and discounted cash flow methods.

N.P.V. appraisals should be made at the 'cost of money' rate to the company since the calculation implies that any capital borrowed is charged interest at this rate and any surplus invested earns interest at the same rate. Assuming cost of money 8 per cent, the N.P.V.'s of Schemes A, B and C outlined in Mr Nelson's letter, are 302, 289 and 167, respectively, confirming the 1, 2, 3 ranking.

The D.C.F. yield calculation assumes that all capital is charged and all surpluses earn interest at the yield rate, but only Project C produces a surplus when discounted. If the investment of this surplus is at 8 per cent cost of money the D.C.F. yield rate is reduced from 26.7 to 23.2 and the projects again rank 1, 2, 3.

Assumptions of reinvestment at other than cost of money imply the existence of another project and any cash so invested must earn its return separately in that project. It is only to be expected that changes in the rate of reinvestment will alter the ranking, but they cannot be regarded as part of the D.C.F. yield calculation.

Yours faithfully,

London EC2.

N. V. KNIGHT.

D.C.F. and P.V. — Whose Approach?

SIR, — I wholeheartedly agree with Mr P. L. Griffiths (August 27th issue) that national prejudices should not be introduced into the subject. I would, however, venture a word of caution to him against introducing a similar sort of bias, namely a professional one, against a technique which, if used intelligently by the informed, is of immaculate quality.

Since Mr Griffiths makes the incomprehensible assertion that 'I.R.R. (implied rate of return) takes no account of the realizable value of the capital asset', I am forced to question his grasp of the subject. If he means that it is impossible to estimate the salvage value of the capital asset (at any given time in its life), one cannot attribute the blame to I.R.R./D.C.F. This is solely due to the inadequacy of the forecasting technique.

It can never be repeated too often that I.R.R./D.C.F., or indeed any other similar technique, is not a talisman for investment decisions. It is just one of the methods of presenting the implications of available data to the decision-maker. Like the computer, it can only be as good as the information fed into it and it should never be used by those who do not fully appreciate both its virtues and its limitations.

Yours faithfully,

London EC2

P. G. NICHOLSON.

Income Tax Returns 1966/67

SIR, — We have not succeeded in running to earth any statutory authority for the request on page (3) section (9) of Form 11 (1966) which requires entry for each holding of the gross amount of dividends and interest, etc.

Reference to District Inspectors has elicited no answer but Surtax Control have admitted, in a letter to us, that this information is not required.

Obviously to maintain proper records for clients' taxation affairs a list must be drawn for each fiscal year which is a useful check on changes of investments.

However, it is thought that either the Revenue should take power to request this information or amend the income tax return forms in future years.

Yours faithfully,

CANNON.

Practice Performance

SIR, — I have been pursuing, and set out below, some 'two o'clock in the morning' casual research into the 'fruits' of our profession by way of Good Practice Performance issued by The Institute in July 1965. Admittedly, these are 'first shot' figures and may be somewhat slightly (but I submit not widely) subject to some minor correction. I am, however, led to ask the question 'What's good about it':

Average earnings of so-called 'seniors' — £1,020 p.a.

Average earnings of partners — £2,983 p.a.

Consequently I am forcibly reminded of an utterance of many years ago, by the then chairman of 'You know who' — probably earning many thousands in excess of the above averages — at an annual dinner of the Students' Society to which I was invited by my articled clerks; in his reply to a toast, he said, 'It isn't so much what you chaps get out of the profession as what you put into it . . .'

And so we still politely pursue a purely pitiful penance of penurious poverty.

Yours faithfully,

London W1.

Accountants in Retirement

SIR, — Referring to the penultimate paragraph of Mr Sherbrooke-Walker's contribution in your issue of September 3rd, I imagine the adage will not readily be forgotten, that most wives marry their husbands for better or for worse, but not for lunch!

Yours faithfully,

Radlett, Herts.

Equipment in the Office

Compact Electric Typewriter

THE Praxis 48 typewriter is a compact electric machine designed for people whose work load is not large enough to justify the cost of a standard electric machine. It is of particular use, for example, to executives who type their own confidential reports, receptionists who also handle correspondence, accountants, journalists or sales representatives.

A variable personal touch tuning control caters for individual preferences and makes the Praxis ideal for an operator who has been used to the heavy keyboard pressure of a manual machine.

Repeat characters and repeat spacing, normally found only on some large office machines, are standard on the Praxis. Back spacing, line spacing and forward spacing can repeat automatically, as can the 'x', full stop, hyphen and underscore keys.

Price: £115.

British Olivetti Ltd, 30 Berkeley Square, London W1.

Inexpensive Add-lister

A NEW hand-operated adding machine which costs only £34 15s is the Scandia twelve-key machine. This latest addition to the Adwel range has an entering capacity of £999 19s 11½d and a totalling capacity of £9,999 19s 11½d.

The new Scandia twelve-key hand-operated adding machine

The machine is equipped with subtraction, non-add, repeat, correction and column indication facilities. The latter feature makes it possible to insert an invoice number or other numerical reference beside any entry on the tally roll, the tally roll itself being viewed through a magnifying glass which enlarges figures and symbols to several times their actual size. An additional feature is the indicator which shows a green signal when the machine is ready for use and a red warning signal when figures are entered in the accumulator.

Adwel Adding Machines Ltd, 11 St Cross Street, Hatton Garden, London EC1.

Analysis Forms

TWINLOCK Interstyle analysis work forms are available for cash or for abstract analysis.

The forms are tinted in light green tint that is relaxing to the eye. Columns are identified by progressively deepening shades of green so that the correct column is discernible at a glance.

This colour coding greatly assists the eye in isolating and comparing figure groups, and in following vertical, horizontal or diagonal progressions. Columns, cross casting and faint lines, printed in light grey, are numbered for speedy cross reference.

These new Twinlock forms have a grid module system to provide standardized column and grid specification with high legibility, regardless of paper dimensions. Based on the average space taken to write a single character, and aligned in the same way as calculators, the grid modules allow for a large range of analysis problems.

The forms are available in three sizes: A4, A3 and 11½ by 11 in. The maximum number of columns on cash ruling is 31 and 23 for abstract rulings. For analysis problems requiring a greater number of columns, sheets printed with six columns each side are available. A variety of spaces on both forms allow for general and particular headings, sub-heads, coding and secondary analysis.

Interstyle forms are supplied in tablet packs of seventy-five sheets with drawer cover protectors, and are punched for new loose-leaf binders. These are produced in the same tones of green as the forms and they offer the full versatility of loose-leaf, put sheets in, take them out, move them around, index them at will.

Prices: From 16s 6d to 24s 6d a pad.

Compact Electrostatic Copier

AT £395 the ADM 350 is claimed to be the lowest priced copier of its kind in Great Britain. Compact and lightweight – it measures 26 by 22 by 15 in. and weighs 72 lb. – the copier has an attractive blue and white crackle finish, and just one operating control for maximum simplicity. The machine uses 500-foot rolls of zinc-oxide coated paper, and wastage is reduced by a guillotine which cuts the paper to the exact length of the original document. In this way the ADM 350 will copy documents of any length from 5 in. to 500 ft. The rolls come in two widths – 8½ in. and 11 in. – and as many as 750 quarto-sized copies can be made from a single loading at a cost of 3.32d a copy. Roll-change takes a few seconds.

Any single-sheet document can be copied, whether

THE CHARTERED ACCOUNTANTS' BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION

At a recent meeting of the Executive Committee the chair was taken by Sir William Carrington, F.C.A., President of the Association, and seven members were present.

Applications for assistance

Seven new applications were considered; grants or donations were made in six cases; in the other case the committee decided that assistance could not be given at present and consideration of the case was deferred for one year.

One application was from the young widow of a member in practice who died earlier this year. There are three young children. The estate was sufficient only to enable the mortgage on her house to be paid off and to provide her with a small income. An appropriate grant was made.

Twenty-nine applications for renewal of assistance were considered; in twenty cases the grant was renewed and in four cases it was increased; five cases were deferred for further information.

Special fund

An application for further assistance was considered and the grant was renewed.

Changed circumstances of beneficiaries

Thirteen cases were reported in which circumstances had changed during the last three months. Donations or loans were made in certain cases and the grant of one beneficiary was increased.

E.C.G.D. IN READING

The Export Credits Guarantee Department last week opened a branch office in Reading at 18 The Forbury, which will be responsible for business in the counties of Berkshire, Buckingham, Hampshire and Oxfordshire. The telephone number is Reading 40577-8. Telex: 34422.

There are already 275 policyholders in the area with a total face value of £45 million per annum. Apart from providing a better service to these existing policyholders, it is believed that there is substantial scope for insuring more of the area's export business.

INSTITUTE OF INTERNAL AUDITORS London Chapter

The Education Committee of the London Chapter of the Institute of Internal Auditors has arranged a further series of three one-day meetings for members of the Institute and their senior assistants at Unilever House, London EC4, during October-December.

ACCOUNTING FOR HOTEL MANAGEMENT

by

T. J. BARRETT, F.A.C.C.A.

The author, who has had many years of experience in the hotel industry, is a qualified accountant and is a member of the Council of the Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants. The purpose of this book is to try to assist those who are anxious to understand the systems of accounting which are in use in hotels. One is, however, immediately confronted with problems of deciding which systems and for which hotel. For it must be remembered that although there is a thread of consistency in all systems in all hotels the variations in their application are the consequence of the differences between one hotel and another.

The obvious difficulty is therefore to make this book adequate to meet the requirements of those who may be in charge of any type or size of hotel.

The plan has been to trace the basic system of accounts with appropriate additional text and explanation to provide a picture of the whole conception of accounting as applied in the hotel industry.

In covering the whole field of hotel accounting from the tabular to mechanization and from bar results to uniform accounting statements this book has dealt with all the aspects of the subject and should be of great value to those who are undergoing training for management in an industry which is probably one of the most demanding ones of the present time.

ACCOUNTANTS AND
THE LAW OF NEGLIGENCEby R. W. V. DICKERSON, B.Com., LL.B., Ph.D., C.A.

A subject of great interest and concern to the accounting profession is the question of accountants' legal responsibility. At the present time no comprehensive volume fully covering the subject is available and this book is designed to fill this gap.

The book discusses in considerable detail the accountant's duty and standard of care, his liability to his clients and to third parties if negligence or fraud is proved. It covers his various responsibilities not only in his capacity as accountant and auditor but also as tax or business adviser, arbitrator and valuer.

A collection of fifty-seven leading Court cases in England, Ireland, South Africa, Australia, New Zealand, India and Canada, as well as cases in various States of the United States, are reprinted and arranged to suit the convenience of both accountants and lawyers.

Decisions which are reported in the standard law reports have not been reproduced but quotations more extensive than is usual in a legal textbook have been made from the judgments. In this way, the book is fully usable by those who do not have access to a law library.

Cases which are unreported or which have been reported only in a series of law reports now out of print or less well-known are reproduced in their entirety. For the unreported cases the official transcript of the Court's decision or the trial judge's summation has been used or, where this was impossible to obtain, the report as it appeared in a newspaper or other journal has been reproduced.

The author is a Canadian chartered accountant and lawyer who has practised in Canada as an accountant and later as a lawyer. He obtained a Ph.D. in taxation law at the London School of Economics and returned to Canada to join the Faculty of Law at the University of British Columbia. He is joint author with Professor G. S. A. Wheatcroft and others of Estate and Gift Taxation and has written numerous articles in legal and accounting journals.

His analysis covers, among other subjects, the legal aspects of these major areas:

DUTY OF CARE

Statutory and non-statutory audits
Dangers in unwritten audit contracts

STANDARD OF CARE

Reliance on experts
The audit report:
- ambiguous and misleading reports
- qualifications and disclaimers
- differences in audit of public and private companies
- libellous reports
The audit period:
- interim audit work
- responsibility for post-balance sheet events.

VERIFICATION OF PARTICULAR ITEMS AND TRANSACTIONS

What the Courts have had to say about verification procedures in particular circumstances
The auditor's responsibility for knowing the law, and the audit of a trustee's accounts.

THE MEASURE OF DAMAGES

How damages are assessed against an accountant who has been found negligent
Topics of consequential damages, reliance, remoteness and certainty of damage, prior remedies and mitigation of damages.

LIABILITIES OF THIRD PARTIES

The development of the law in this area on the responsibility of the accountant to persons other than his client.

OTHER DUTIES AND FUNCTIONS OF THE PROFESSIONAL ACCOUNTANT

The accountant's duty of secrecy
The accountant and conflicts of interest
Cases dealing with the legal responsibilities of the accountant when acting as business adviser, tax adviser, arbitrator and valuer.

The handsomely bound 664-page volume, priced at 67s should be in every accountant's office.

ACCOUNTING FOR HOTEL MANAGEMENT

by

T. J. BARRETT, F.A.C.C.A.

The author, who has had many years of experience in the hotel industry, is a qualified accountant and is a member of the Council of the Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants. The purpose of this book is to try to assist those who are anxious to understand the systems of accounting which are in use in hotels. One is, however, immediately confronted with problems of deciding which systems and for which hotel. For it must be remembered that although there is a thread of consistency in all systems in all hotels the variations in their application are the consequence of the differences between one hotel and another.

The obvious difficulty is therefore to make this book adequate to meet the requirements of those who may be in charge of any type or size of hotel.

The plan has been to trace the basic system of accounts with appropriate additional text and explanation to provide a picture of the whole conception of accounting as applied in the hotel industry.

In covering the whole field of hotel accounting from the tabular to mechanization and from bar results to uniform accounting statements this book has dealt with all the aspects of the subject and should be of great value to those who are undergoing training for management in an industry which is probably one of the most demanding ones of the present time.

Efficient Accounting Methods

by HOWARD F. WILSON, F.C.A., M.I.O.M.

The study of methods of accounting has not in the past received nearly as much attention from accountants as has the study of principles. Books describing the simplification of clerical methods and the insistence of the sellers of accounting machines on the superiority of their 'systems' (as distinct from their machines) have persuaded many accountants in industry and commerce that accounting technicalities are not their concern but that of 'experts'.

That this view is not accepted by the leaders of the accountancy profession is shown by (1) the announcement by The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales and The Institute of Chartered Accountants in Ireland of the introduction of a new examination for a Certificate in Management Information, with a syllabus which will include 'the design of systems and data processing', and (2) the announced intention of the five leading accountancy bodies to introduce a Diploma in Management Accounting Services which will cover (inter alia) 'office organization, methods and equipment'.

Thus the publication of this book (the first in this field written particularly for accountants) is timely and it should prove an excellent textbook for the examinations of both the Certificate and the Diploma. The book is divided into two parts. The first describes methods of carrying out accounting requirements and follows the same sequence as that usually adopted by books on accounting principles. Part 2 is devoted to the use of machines, varying from the typewriter to the computer, not from the standpoint of a machine salesman but dispassionately and critically. The advantages and disadvantages are all stated, and the reader is shown how to assess the value of alternative types of machines by the preparation of cost assessments.

The Accountant Synopsis of the 1966 Finance Act

Review of Incomes and Spending

THE publication, last week, of the annual Blue Book on National Income and Expenditure 1966 (H.M.S.O. 7s 6d), has occasioned less comment in the Press and in news bulletins than is usually the case. This may well be due to the more immediately pressing claims of foreign affairs, the Commonwealth Conference, and the economic crisis at home.

Nevertheless this Blue Book contains, as always, a vast and fascinating range of information on economic trends in Britain over the past decade. In any discussion of its contents only a small proportion of the available material can be considered. This particular review of the survey relates to the size of and changes in personal and company incomes, and the spending and appropriation patterns which have arisen therefrom.

The gross national product in 1965 is shown as £30,900 million, the equivalent of £560 per head of population. In 1955, the G.N.P. was slightly less than £17,000 million or £335 per head. On the face of it, this seems a considerable increase in national output and therefore in national income. Alas, however, the falling value of money has eaten substantially into the nominal increase. At 1958 prices, the increase per head over the ten years is 26 per cent – an average of little more than 2 per cent per annum. This increase, in monetary terms, in the G.N.P. per head has obviously been accompanied by corresponding increases in personal incomes.

In the tables on the distribution of personal income before and after tax, the period covered is the five years 1959 to 1964. Nevertheless, the growth in incomes in the middle-income range has been substantial. In 1959 there were some 2.7 million incomes in the £1,000–£2,000 range, by 1964 the number had risen to 6.94 millions. The number of incomes of £10,000 and over rose from 17,000 to 32,000.

The burden of direct taxation changed but little over the five years. In 1959 such taxation removed about 10½ per cent of personal incomes; in 1964 it took 11½ per cent – largely because more people were in the tax range and its higher échelons.

Average wages in the manufacturing industry were £440 in 1955 and £765 ten years later. Corresponding figures for salaries were £660 and £1,120, respectively. The decade's increase is 74 per cent in the case of wages and 70 per cent in salaries. This effectively scotches the notion that wages increase much faster than salaries. There might have been an element of truth in this some years ago, but over the past five years average salaries have probably increased a little faster than average wages.

Last year personal incomes, including such transfer payments as pensions and National Insurance benefits, amounted to £29,750 million; 70 per cent of this total came from employment, and just over 8 per cent or one-twelfth of the total from self-employment. Rent, dividends and interest provided nearly 12 per cent, or just under one-eighth of the total, while 10 per cent or one-tenth came from national health and insurance benefits.

How did the totality of persons use these personal incomes? The Blue Book shows that 76 per cent was spent; a little more than 11 per cent was paid in direct taxation;  $5\frac{1}{2}$  per cent went in national health and insurance contributions, and nearly  $6\frac{1}{2}$  per cent was saved.

In 1955 personal incomes totalled £15,600 million. Seventy per cent of this came from employment; over 10 per cent from self-employment; 10 per cent from rent, dividends and interest; and  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent from national health and insurance benefits. The past decade has therefore seen a slight deterioration in the relative position of the self-employed – professionals, farmers, and sole traders – an improvement in the rentier class, and more generous health and insurance benefits.

The 1955 expenditure and savings pattern was appreciably different from that shown for 1965. Then 84 per cent of total personal incomes was spent, nearly 9 per cent went in taxation, just under 4 per cent was taken by health and insurance contributions, and  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent was saved. On account of the graduated system of direct taxation, an increase in the total of personal incomes is bound to cause an increase in the relative burden of taxation. More generous national health and pensions benefits have been matched by higher contributions and it would appear that the affluent society has become more savings conscious.

The changes in spending habits brought about by the growth in affluence is shown in the Blue Book's tables on consumers' expenditure. In 1965, consumers' expenditure amounted to £22,700 million, of which one-quarter went on food. Ten years earlier, when consumers' expenditure was £13,100 million, 30 per cent of the total was spent on food. It is a well-known economic law that as incomes rise, the proportion spent on food tends to decline.

Expenditure on alcoholic drinks and tobacco amounted to £2,850 million last year, or one-eighth of the total consumed expenditure. In 1955, about 13 per cent of consumer expenditure was taken up by drink and tobacco – a slightly higher percentage of the total. The stability of this proportion over the post-war period has been quite remarkable.

Consumers' durable goods – motor vehicles, furniture, floor coverings, radio and electrical goods – accounted for 7 per cent of all consumers' expenditure in 1955. Last year the proportion was 8 per cent. The affluent society makes its greatest impact through an increase in the proportion of incomes spent on services and foreign travel. Expenditure on 'other services' doubled between 1955 and 1965 and in the latter year was one-eighth of the total. Consumer expenditure abroad also doubled between 1955 and 1965.

So much for the analysis of consumer income and expenditure; what has happened to the income of companies over the past decade and how has this income been disposed of? Last year, company income totalled £7,400 million, nearly one-fifth of which came from overseas. Of the income earned at home, four-fifths came by way of gross trading profits, the remaining one-fifth was rent and non-trading income.

Total company income in 1955 was £4,120 million, of which  $17\frac{1}{2}$  per cent was income from abroad. The increase in company income between 1955 and 1965 was 80 per cent, compared with an increase in wages and salaries of  $72\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.

Last year, 35 per cent of gross income was paid out by way of interest and dividends. This was a very much higher proportion than in 1965 when only  $22\frac{1}{2}$  per cent of gross income was so paid out. This large increase has been made possible by changes in company taxation claims. United Kingdom taxes on company income, adjusted for changes in tax reserves, made up only 9 per cent of gross income in 1965; taxes paid abroad accounted for another 7 per cent.

A decade ago no less than 23 per cent of company income went in U.K. taxes and a further  $6\frac{1}{2}$  per cent in taxes paid abroad. In all, taxation took almost twice as much, in percentage terms, in 1955 as in 1965. The reduction in the percentage taken by taxation was more or less balanced by the proportion paid out as interest and dividends. In 1965, undistributed income before providing for depreciation and stock appreciation amounted to just over 45 per cent of total income compared with 44 per cent in 1955. The proportion of the gross national product absorbed by depreciation was much the same in 1965 as in 1955 – about 9 per cent.

Last year, companies invested £3,300 million compared with £1,875 million in 1955. The 1965 figure is only 60 per cent greater than in 1955 but investment, in the sense understood in the Blue Book, comprises gross domestic fixed capital formation, increase in value of stocks and work in progress, and net acquisition of financial assets including net investment abroad. Gross domestic fixed capital formation was two and a half times as great in 1965 as it had been in 1955. Over this period net acquisition of financial assets fell substantially, whilst the increase in the value of stocks and work in progress was of the order of 25 per cent.

Economic Warning

FOR all the continuing discussion of the economic situation and the various measures taken by the Government to bring the external payments account into balance, very little real progress is being made. For reasons that the latest annual survey of the United Kingdom economy by the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development (H.M.S.O., 5s) makes all too clear, the key to the future reposes in a policy of containing private consumption.

Before long, the existing 'freeze' on incomes will have to be abandoned and, while Mr CROSSMAN was right in predicting that the methods of collective bargaining would never be the same again, the fact is that no one has yet devised a policy whereby the growth in incomes can be equated with the rise in productivity. Without such a policy all the plans for 1970 will go by the board and, despite the latest assurance of U.S. aid which means that there is no danger of forced devaluation this year, sterling would again be in jeopardy.

Some indication of the magnitude of the problems confronting the U.K. economy are provided in the O.E.C.D. survey. A return to external balance is likely to be delayed until 1967 and even this cannot be assumed to be certain. It depends on exports rising at what the survey terms 'a good rate' and some reduction in the volume of imports.

The prospects for world trade suggest that markets will be buoyant and thus give British exporters their chance. On the other hand, the abandonment of the import surcharge after two years next November will not help keep the import figure down and its future must be viewed with concern.

The need for attaining a substantial surplus on the external account is brought home by the fact that, at the end of April this year, the outstanding debt commitments arising out of the international action to support sterling amounted to about £900 million. Of this sum £357 million is repayable to the International Monetary Fund by the end of 1967 and the remainder by the end of 1970. In theory, as the O.E.C.D. survey points out, the trade surplus required to meet these contractual obligations could be reduced, either by drawing still further on the reserves or by taking advantage of any short-term inflow of international capital.

The report brings the reader rapidly back to earth by pointing out that the reserves at end-April were some £1,257 million, of which £516 million represented part of the Government's dollar securities. The reserves will almost certainly be drawn upon to meet most of the first repayment to the I.M.F., but to rely on short-term capital inflows would be the height of folly or, to quote the survey, 'inadvisable'.

The requisite surplus on external account will certainly 'not be easy to achieve and will be difficult to reconcile with a substantially higher growth rate'. In other words, any possibility of the Government reversing the present deflationary policies seems premature. They have only now just begun to bite, and to accede to demands to reflate would be to repeat the mistakes made by the Government's predecessors in office on earlier occasions. In short, one cannot dispute the O.E.C.D. conclusion that return to equilibrium on the external payments account 'looks as if it is likely to be gradual and long drawn out'.

The survey concedes that a return to expansionist policies could be expedited 'if a greater restraint on incomes and prices' could be achieved. The alternative to such a cautious policy, it observes, would appear to be a repetition of recent experience and a new phase of 'go and stop', and 'a succession of such phases must be the worst way to achieve a climate favouring growth'.

Developing the need for restraint on consumption within the domestic economy, the survey notes that 'during the period in which the pressure on resources is being reduced, aggregate demand will have to rise less than capacity and, within the total (of the gross national product) exports should rise faster than domestic demand'.

Put into simple terms what the O.E.C.D. experts are saying is this: private consumption must for all practicable purposes be reduced, unless the public sector cuts down its claims on resources, while virtually any increase in the national product must be diverted into goods for the export markets. At best, to quote the conclusion of the survey, 'once the pressure of demand has been brought down to an appropriate level, the aggregate demand could begin to rise in line with capacity' (our italics). In other words, incomes might be allowed to increase to the extent that productivity is increased.

If there remains any doubt on these issues the last word is surely with the O.E.C.D. experts. 'In all probability, equilibrium will not be restored to the basic balance until 1967 and, even then, the underlying situation may provide little scope for more expansionary demand-management policies. The authorities should therefore stand ready to intensify their present policies if the need arises.' And this, the Government would have us believe, is exactly what they are now doing.

Land-owning Companies and Case VII

WHEN the Finance Act 1962 imposed income tax, under the new Case VII of Schedule D, on short-term gains, it distinguished land from other kinds of property. For all other types of property one needed to retain them for only six months in order to avoid the new tax; for land the period was three years. The draftsman of the Act assumed that some people would try to make a quick deal in land by procuring companies owned by them to buy the land, and then selling the issued share capital of the companies. In this way they would need to wait only six months instead of three years in order to realize a profit free of Case VII tax; hence section 14 of the Finance Act 1962 which was intended to circumvent this device.

The section cannot apply unless there is a 'land-owning company' which subsection (6) defines as 'a company not carrying on a trade of dealing in or developing land, but entitled to land, being chargeable assets, to a value equal to or exceeding one-fifth of the net value of all its assets.'

'Value' here means market value and the subsection makes it clear that while debts are deducted in computing net assets, the company's interests in land are taken at their gross value without deducting any charge thereon. This maximizes the scope of the definition.

Subsection (1) expressly imposes Case VII tax on a person disposing of shares in a company no matter how long he has owned them if, immediately before the disposal either:

- (a) the company is or has control of a land-owning company under the control of not more than five persons and in which he has a substantial interest; or
- (b) the company, or a company of which it has control, has a substantial interest in a land-owning company under the control of not more than five persons, and the company is one of which he has control, or of which he and persons connected with him have control.

'Control' is as defined in section 333 of the Income Tax Act 1952. In deciding whether this control can be exercised by fewer than six persons, the appropriate test is the same as in the old surtax direction rules which are contained in section 256 of the 1952 Act. It follows that the vast majority of companies are controlled by not more than five persons.

These apparently harsh provisions of section 14 (1) are subject to the rest of the section. Subsection (2) makes it clear (or at any rate fairly clear) that it is only where the land-owning company acquired land after April 9th, 1962, that section 14 liability can attach to the disposal of the shares. If, but for section 14, the person disposing of them would not be chargeable under Case VII, then

- (c) he is not chargeable unless 'chargeable gains' would have accrued to the company (or to a land-owning company in (a) or (b) above) on the company disposing of its land at market value at the same time, and the other land-owning company in (a) or (b) also disposing of its land at that time; and
- (d) he shall not, if a gain accrues to him, be chargeable by reference to it to tax on an amount greater than the amount of the 'chargeable gains' under (c) above or such part of the (c) gains as is attributable to the shares he disposed of.

The expression 'chargeable gains' used above is carefully defined by subsection (3) as 'gains chargeable under Case VII' which provides for notional deductions in arriving at the notional gain. Subsection (5) makes the winding-up rights of the shares determine how much of the notional chargeable gains of a company are attributable to those shares. 'Substantial interest' is, broadly speaking, one-tenth in market value of all the shares of the company (subsection (7)). However, in deciding whether a shareholder has a substantial interest one counts also the shares of persons 'connected with' him, as defined in paragraph 19 of Schedule 9 to the 1962 Act.

When the Finance Act 1965 introduced long-term capital gains tax, section 17 (1) also amended Case VII by cutting out the six-months and three-year periods and substituting a general period of twelve months. Section 17 (1) ended with the words 'and section 14 of the Finance Act 1962 . . . shall cease to have effect'. However, in the clause as appearing in the original 1965 Bill this was contradicted by sub-clause (11) which read:

'(11) This section, shall not have effect in relation to an acquisition and disposal if either the acquisition or the disposal occurred before April 7th, 1965, and the repeal by this section of section 14 of the Finance Act 1962 shall not have effect where the relevant land of the land-owning company mentioned in that section was acquired by that company before April 7th, 1965.'

We have italicized the last thirty-five words because they appear to be completely nugatory. The sub-clause survived as subsection (14) of section 17, the only alteration being the addition, at the beginning, of the obviously necessary words 'The foregoing provisions of'.

The Government's original intention was that the six-months and three-year limits were to continue to apply to acquisitions made before April 7th, 1965. In other words, if a taxpayer bought land on April 5th, 1965, he had to keep it until April 4th, 1968; if he bought it on April 7th, 1965, he need keep it only until April 6th, 1966. This produced severe criticism which was partly met by the introduction of what is now subsection (15) providing for the imposition, instead of Case VII income tax, of long-term capital gains tax, where land was acquired before April 7th, 1965, but was retained for more than twelve months but less than three years. The computation of the long-term capital gain is to be on Case VII lines, i.e. there is no exclusion of the element of gain attributable to the period before April 6th, 1965. Subsection (15) says in terms that income tax is not to be charged 'by virtue of section 10 of the Finance Act 1962' (which imposes Case VII tax) but that a gain so exempted is to 'be treated for the purposes of Part III of this Act' (which imposes long-term capital gains tax) as if it were chargeable gain as defined in Part III.

How does all this leave section 14 of the 1962 Act? It seems to us that despite section 17 (14) there can be no liability under section 14 in respect of disposals after April 5th, 1965.

It is a sine qua non of section 14 liability that 'chargeable gains would have accrued to the company . . .' and these chargeable gains, which we will call 'Case VII gains' are gains chargeable under Case VII. But can a company have Case VII gains? Section 82 (2) of the Finance Act 1965 reads:

'(2) Income tax shall not be charged by virtue of section 10 or section 14 of the Finance Act 1962 (short-term gains) in respect of an acquisition and disposal of any chargeable assets by a company . . . and accordingly sections 10 and 14 shall not apply for corporation tax.

This subsection has effect:

- (a) in relation to an acquisition or disposal if either the acquisition or disposal, whichever is the earlier, occurs on or before April 6th, 1965, but the disposal or acquisition, whichever is the later, occurs after April 6th, 1965; and
- (b) in relation to an acquisition and disposal if both the acquisition and disposal occur on or after April 6th, 1965.'

Section 82 (3) provides for any gain under (a) above to be treated as a 'chargeable gain' for the purposes of section 82 (1), i.e. a chargeable gain within the meaning of the long-term capital gains tax provisions, as defined in Part III of the Finance Act 1965 (see section 46 (5) (b)). The computation of this long-term chargeable gain is to be made on Case VII lines but it remains a long-term chargeable gain, not a Case VII gain.

It follows then that since a company cannot have 'chargeable gains' in the section 14 sense, there cannot be section 14 liability, and the efforts of the last thirty-five words of section 17 (14) of the 1965 Act to preserve section 14 are nugatory.

Where the land-owning company has owned the land for more than the statutory twelve months there is an additional reason why there can be no liability under section 14 in respect of a sale of shares. Section 17 (15) of the 1965 Act says that a gain by the company on the disposal of the land shall be treated as if it were a chargeable gain as defined in Part III of the Act, i.e. as though it were a long-term capital gain. Here again the computation of the long-term capital gain is to be on Case VII lines but the charge is not to Case VII tax, it is a charge to the long-term capital gains tax. Once again we point out that it is a sine qua non of section 14 liability that Case VII gains would arise to the land-owning company if it disposed of the land. Section 17 (15) makes section 82 (2) unnecessary after April 5th, 1966, and the latter section is repealed by the 1966 Finance Act.

The most likely explanation of this lacuna in the statutory provisions is that the draftsman got into a muddle between rules of chargeability and rules of computation. No attempt has been made to put it right in the Finance Act 1966. Indeed, the lacuna seems to be the subject of an impenetrable official silence. In the capital gains tax booklet issued by the Inland Revenue in February 1966, there is an appendix which purports to explain the amendments to short-term gains tax. Paragraph 3 says that section 14 of the Finance Act 1962 is repealed but that the repeal does not have effect if either the acquisition or the disposal took place on or before April 6th, 1965. But the same paragraph says that gains on disposal of land held more than twelve months are taxed as long-term gains. Paragraph 7 says that short-term gains accruing to companies after April 6th, 1965, are excluded from short-term gains tax. It refers the reader to paragraph 25 in respect of pre-April 1965 acquisitions. But paragraph 25 also says that for disposals within the original short-term gains periods the Case VII computation rules apply, but the charge is a charge to long-term capital gains tax.

It is by no means an unfamiliar feature of income tax history to impose a charge under one schedule and to provide for the computation of quantum by reference to the rules of another schedule. Market garden profits were once charged under Schedule B but computed under Schedule D.

New Stock Exchange Rule on Members' Accounts

FOLLOWING the extensive revision during the last year of Rule 79A relating to member firms' accounts and capital requirements, the Council of the Stock Exchange have issued a new booklet setting out the rule, and giving notes thereon, for the guidance of member firms and their accountants. Each firm has been supplied with two copies, one of which is required to be passed to the firm's independent accountants.

The revised notes are stated to have been issued with the approval of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, The Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland and The Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants. Note 10 states that the independent accountants' report is required to be addressed to the Council of the Stock Exchange who will 'place great reliance' on the report and the accountant's verification of the assets and liabilities of the firm.

It follows, adds the note, that the accountant will need to do a considerable amount of auditing work and base his examination of the books and records (including correspondence files) on a careful and critical review of the system of accounting and internal control. Nevertheless, it will be for the accountant to decide to what extent he makes spot checks or obtains independent verification of balances. Points to which particular attention should be paid, it is noted, include (a) soundness of debts due to the firm; (b) adequacy of provisions made for liabilities and losses, including losses on collection of debts; (c) system of control over securities held for safe custody; and (d) provision of information required for other stated purposes.

The booklet contains a specimen pro forma balance sheet designed to assist firms of stockbrokers in understanding the accounting provisions of the revised rule.

Cut in Public Expenditure Needed

THE discussion generated by the flow of topical pamphlets on economic and social issues from the Institute of Economic Affairs is likely to be considerably enlivened by the latest Occasional Paper from that source entitled After the Boom. . . (3s 6d). Its author is Sir John Hicks, the eminent economist whose views would attract attention at any time, even if they were not so provocative as they are in this paper.

Sir John ascribes the problems of the economy to excessive claims by the public sector on the national product and, in particular, he takes local government to task. Whereas between 1960 and 1965, central government outlays rose by about one-third, local expenditure, both capital and current, increased by two-thirds from £1,908 million to £5,257 million.

Sir John concedes that much of this increased outlay has been devoted to education and is the result of national policy. But other local outlays have also risen sharply, and, in his opinion, it is impossible to defend this. Such outlays would not have been made, he believes, if the cost had been brought home to those responsible for it.

To meet this problem Sir John would like to see a radical reform of local spending procedures. He rejects the proposal that it be transferred entirely to the Treasury since it would be contrary to democratic government. For the time being, he suggests, the costs of secondary education be transferred to the Exchequer and brought firmly under Treasury control.

How effective this would be in restraining local expenditure it is hard to say. Much of the expenditure on education is already dictated by the central government and is more effectively controlled from the centre than Sir John seems to acknowledge. On the other hand, in the light of the statistical evidence he assembles, it is impossible to reject his main argument that something must be done to check the mounting expenditure in the public sector, both at home and overseas.

As he rightly points out, taxation cannot be used effectively to restrain consumption when even the public sector demands more resources, for the result is merely inflationary.

This is My Life

by An Industrious Accountant

IT was a great day recently for Tishy, the youthful assistant in our costing section, when he passed the exam for which he had been studying hard over the last twelve months. He had worked steadily on his correspondence course, supplemented by evening tuition at the local technical college, and he had succeeded beyond his expectations. I shook a hand already wrung to a painful state by his friends on the staff and added my hearty congratulations. He grinned cheerfully and gave me both barrels in reply.

'You told me I'd rank for promotion if I passed', he challenged. 'What about it, sir?' While I struggled to put into appropriate words an explanation that it wasn't all that simple at short notice, he placed a sparsely-documented sheet on my desk.

'For reimbursement of my out-of-pockets', he said. 'Not that it'll stay in my pocket very long; Lulu and I are going to do the town in style tonight.' (Lulu was a dark-haired damsel in the typing pool whose bright eyes had sparked off an answering fire in Tishy's.)

We have a system by which we refund to successful examinees 50 per cent of their study costs – an arrangement which has helped a good few youngsters over this difficult stile in recent years, so his claim was valid enough. The details weren't, however. Course fees, student registration fees and textbooks, yes; but £2 10s for 'textbook (economics) lost and replaced', no. Similarly for 'travelling expenses, estimated' there had to be another amendment which he accepted, philosophically, seeing that the local technical college is within a stone's throw of his lodgings.

He'd done well for himself by comparison, I thought, remembering how times had changed since my own training days. In those faraway times the small professional firm in which I worked didn't dream of reimbursing expenses. On the contrary, the manager who had been designated as my supervisor showed the traditional scepticism of so many of his generation. I can see him now, superciliously critical of the impassioned urges of my correspondence course brochure which he aspersed as pretentious and over-rated.

I learned later that he had himself failed in a similar effort in his own youth. He sought to compensate for his lack of success, however, by indulging in no fewer than two so-called qualifications which certain bodies are prepared to offer on the grounds of 'present position of responsibility in your firm'. The resultant double fellowship had been a great solace to him afterwards.

It's odd how the stings of long ago remain in one's memory. I resented the supervisor's crustiness. I haven't forgotten his jibe when I suggested that the firm should buy a reference copy of Munro's Book-keeping and Accountancy and let me use it; or his caustic comment that accountants would never make management material. Doubtless according to the ethics of his generation he thought he was acting righteously. . . .

I thought again of Tishy's lost economics book . . . I remembered how hard I'd found it to follow the implications of the gold standard and the movements of sterling on the international monetary market . . . too much righteousness can go sour. I added back the two debateable items on Tishy's docket and felt vaguely compensated for my own old grievances.

Business Accountancy Principles for Improving the Efficiency of the Departments Responsible for Servicing Management – I

by A. P. RAVENHILL, F.C.A.

MY aim in this paper is to discuss the two aspects of efficiency in the accounting service, that is to say:

- (a) how to speed up the preparation of information for management so decisions may be taken as early as possible to achieve increases in profitability, or the elimination of losses, through higher margins or lower expenses, and
- (b) how to improve the office routine and administration so the same work is done in the future at less cost than previously.

2. There can be no set rules which are automatically applicable to every business. The emphasis in the accounting service must be related to the business itself, that is to say whether we are concerned with an industry, a commercial concern, a services company, or a Government department. Even within industry there will be substantial variations in the services to be provided, dependent upon the products being produced. A highly capitalized industry calls for an emphasis on the control and use of fixed assets and compares with a trading or services business, where the working capital is of more significance.

3. This paper can do no more than set out some views as to how improvements might be made in the efficiency of the departments producing facts and figures for the action of management. This action, more often than not, is concerned with the taking of decisions to improve profitability; or to correct an existing unsatisfactory position; or to stop expenditure whether of a capital or revenue nature, which will bring no reward. In other words, efficiency in an office does not, as I see it, concern itself solely with trying to eliminate waste in dealing with current work, but also provides the means by which wasteful expenditure is avoided. The total expense of an effective office cannot therefore always be measured in relation to previous costs of that office, as lack of profits or excessive expenditure may well have been incurred elsewhere in the business through inefficient controls.

4. Accountancy, for this paper, should be interpreted in its widest sense. It includes almost any type of figure work that is carried out in the factory, in the purchases or sales offices, or in statistical or similarly named departments, and for many activities the information may be in units other than sterling. In the majority of businesses maximum efficiency in the accounting service is achieved by the flow of work following an orderly pattern which is recognized and accepted by each department in the business, and avoiding any duplication of effort. Moreover, a co-ordinated and interrelated system ensures that, even if information is extracted by different persons, similar results are presented to management. I believe, therefore, that a principle of organization should be that the clear authority for the accounting function should be within the guidance of one person who will normally be the accountant, even if, for disciplinary purposes, staff in some departments are responsible to another manager.

5. Maximum efficiency in the office is, in my view, only likely to be achieved if the accountant is a member of the senior management team. The accountant must be constantly thinking about the real meaning of figures and pieces of paper; and be able to interpret and explain their usefulness to his colleagues responsible for other departments. I believe that he can be much more effective in this task if he is involved in the decision-taking responsibilities of senior management; and more able to direct his staff into areas of work of maximum value to the business.

Broad principles

6. The accountant, new to his job, will be well rewarded by spending time in the first instance on establishing clearly the main purpose and the aims of his business. This suggestion may seem to be almost an assumption of the task of the managing director. Very seldom, however, does a managing director put his thoughts on paper in this respect and, in consequence, a newcomer to a job needs to sort out his mind

Mr A. P. Ravenhill, the author of this paper presented on Thursday of last week at the Cambridge Summer Course of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, is administrative controller of Fortes Holdings Ltd. He was admitted to membership of the Institute in 1935.

initially, to ensure that he has a clear understanding of the policies and aims of the business as and when he makes recommendations to improve his department's efficiency. Occasionally, a managing director does lose sight of the reason for the continued existence of his business; he may have failed to recognize changes in trading conditions over recent years, or he may be still imbued with his own particular interests when he was a departmental head. In these cases, the accountant may be able to give valuable help through his own analysis.

7. A broad review of the business might well lead to the elimination of some operations not worth continuing, and a decision by the board to concentrate in the future on the more profitable operations of the company. But it is at this stage that the accountant must also take a broad, general view to try to decide if the value received from his department's work (under its different sections) is worth the cost to the business. This means assessing the value of each set of operations and relating such value to the cost of the work; and determining if that same job can be achieved at lower cost, without sacrificing any essential end result. At this stage, I would remind you that this paper does not concern itself at all with the type of information to be produced for management; but only with the methods and equipment – and thinking – needed to achieve efficiency.

8. A fundamental step is therefore to set down the main objectives or purposes of each office activity and to put a sterling cost of doing it. Cost of an activity is only an indication, as the majority of jobs in an office are related one to the other. It does, however, give a starting-point to think about the values derived from such activities, whether it be as a service to customers, employee morale, public relations, or any other essential need. It is possible to begin to think along the lines as to whether the elimination of such expenditure would harm the business; does it in fact cost more than the value received; is there some different approach which might be less costly in doing the job; is close accuracy really necessary or, possibly, can such jobs be done more cheaply outside the business?

9. In this sort of self-questioning process there are times when the accountant will find it difficult to be honest with himself. This more particularly applies to the accountant who initiated improvements and revised systems in previous years. It is important, therefore, that the questioning process uses, if necessary, others within the business, either new to the department or in another administrative section, or a consultant.

10. A general review of this nature enables the accountant to establish contact with his own managers and heads of sections and also the management in other departments, when he determines the use to which the information already produced is being put. It is quite vital, in making successful improvements in efficiency, that the managers involved are whole-heartedly in agreement with the changes. Most managers are inherently conservative and, in general, prefer to go on working as they have always done. The confidence of management in the accountant is therefore extremely important. On the other hand, there are always a few who are progressive and not averse to change. These are the people whom he can call on later to discuss his ideas, and whose support he can enlist at the time his ideas begin to crystallize into specific proposals.

11. Improvements in efficiency, designed to reduce costs, nearly always create extra work during the changeover. For instance, a decision that a logical organization to facilitate co-ordination is the bringing together of four sections of the accounting work into one office, would require the production of instructions, changeover programmes and the design of forms, before the sections could be brought together. The planning work of any major change is vital for success and makes the subsequent run-down in staff a quicker operation than would be the case otherwise. Those of us who have had experience of the introduction of computers will know only too well what a vital element to success is the stage of careful planning, before the routine tasks are undertaken by the machine.

Control of the office

12. Every office is dependent for the processing of its work on pieces of paper or telephone calls from outside sources or other departments within the business. The control of these pieces of paper from the moment they arrive in the office is vital. Often an office is hindered in its effectiveness by the laxity of others in sending the appropriate documentation required for processing through the accounts department.

13. Each piece of paper should, in my view, be looked upon as money. It is customary to take extreme precautions for cash security. The same should be done for pieces of paper. The controls needed will vary with the value of the paper being processed assessed by the extra expense or reduction of profit caused to the business on its loss.

14. The office must resist the temptation of instituting methods to overcome the deficiencies of other departments within the business if pieces of paper arrive late with them. The accountant should give all the advice he can to his colleagues to improve the position. Outside parties – such as suppliers – are often a more difficult problem; there will always be occasions when pro formas will be necessary to speed the office work, but even then the cost should from time to time be measured against the benefits as pro formas are money.

15. Control of the paper coming into the office can often be an integral part of the accounting system. The pre-listing of invoices, debit and credit notes at the time of receipt can be the totals in a control book which also would provide total accounts for the creditors, debtors and stores ledgers. I have no doubt that the intelligent design and reading of a daily control book by an accountant with commercial rather than academic thought is both practical and of inestimable value.

16. There is another technique allied with the control of paper which is very effective in many businesses, that is to say, the marriage of documents. This method avoids the entering of details in books of account and, for instance, may be used to cover all transfers between branches. It is even more useful in establishing the outstanding items at any time, and easily reconcilable with the total account as long as there is strict control over the physical handling of the documents.

Planning the organization of the office

17. With principal objectives and policies of the business well in mind, it is then necessary to determine the present organization of the accounts departments in order that the real purpose of each job may be ascertained and the duties of the various members of the staff laid down clearly. Once these facts have been established regarding the present organization, it is then possible, in the light of the broad principles and the importance of control referred to previously, to consider alternative methods for the organization of the office and to decide whether one type of plan offers advantages over other possibilities.

18. The alternatives must depend upon the nature of the work of each particular office. The work may be of a largely repetitive clerical character; or on the other hand it may be broader in nature, comprising creative, analytical or research activities. Not only is it a question of organizing the work, but also in establishing the level of manager and his assistants needed for the economic working of the department. The problem, although in essence the same in both cases, does mean the development of the most logical grouping of duties and the utilization of the personal qualifications of the existing staff in the most effective way.

19. There are several basic ways in which the work of a large office may be divided. It may be by type of customer, by product, by geography, or by process, or even specific areas of knowledge. The selection may not always be one of free choice but might be dictated by the needs of customers, or company divisions served by the central office.

20. The decisions taken regarding the organization of the office must incorporate the developments in the future as well as merely considering present needs. The future may be one of expected expansion, or it could be a reduction in staff, due to the gradual introduction of computers or other office equipment, or even to a reorganization in the business as a whole. Certainly, it is very seldom indeed that one can anticipate that the accounting department will remain static, any more than may be expected in any other department of a lively business.

21. One further factor which is worth mentioning at this stage is the development that has taken place over recent years in the use of flow charts. This enables the manager, when organizing his office, to ensure that staff are seated in places which would best suit the flow of paper as in the existing system, or in any new system planned to be introduced. The movement of papers and documents around any office can not only be expensive, but also may slow down the work substantially if it does not follow a sensible flow. The flow chart also helps one to visualize relatively easily the bottlenecks in any accounting system which need rather more careful planning in order to ensure that the department as a whole works efficiently and effectively.

Human relationships

22. Probably the most exacting task of any manager is dealing with people, if only because human relationships are constantly in a state of change and flux, thus calling for a sensitivity and understanding in attitudes among subordinates and superiors alike. The supervisor has a group of individuals, each of whom is in his own private world a composite of many individuals, reflecting his private interests. These private interests, whether it is a social club, a church or a school, may at times be demanding of his attention, loyalties and efforts; he may also be preoccupied with problems, often family illnesses – sometimes serious. The manager's problem is to obtain the best from each of these individuals in the interests of his company and to mould them into a cohesive work force, imbued with the common objective of getting out the production.

23. Heads of sections must, in my view, be interested in their employees. In addition, they must be able to plan their work well, be able to install better methods of production and also possess a good technical knowledge of the work for which they are responsible. The head of a section – if he is clearly a better man than any of his employees – will undoubtedly gain the backing of the staff. The accountant must face this matter squarely when he appoints or promotes a manager; length of service should never be a reason for appointment to a managerial position, unless the employee has the right qualities of knowledge and understanding, if the accountant has in mind an efficient office.

24. Organizational changes bring particular problems in the handling of individuals. Ideally, all employees should be kept informed of the progress of reorganization plans. Their opinions should be sought and the management's reasons divulged, so that the results will not be disturbing. In practice, it is by no means always possible to carry out this ideal and it is seldom right to start discussing too much of any reorganization until the overall decisions have been taken, as original reorganizational thinking may change substantially before its finalization.

25. In fact, the matter of ensuring that one obtains complete co-operation from employees is a complex one. On the one hand people resent being ignored, especially today with the increasingly better educated standards, enabling them to appreciate quickly the full implications of any reorganizational plans. On the other hand, it is fundamentally the prerogative of management to manage and to take any steps that are necessary to keep its organization running effectively. This includes the responsibility to promote and transfer personnel for the overall benefit of the organization. In the course of any reorganization, some people are bound to be disappointed because this is inevitable in any process of change.

26. In any office it is the esprit de corps which must be retained, more especially if the office is one which runs most smoothly on ideas which will never come to the surface if the staff are unhappy. The accountant should, in my view, ensure that each individual situation is examined by management in the light of any organizational changes. The most difficult problems which might take the most time will be where older employees are displaced, or their former duties regrouped, and they find themselves in a position of less value to the organization. The considerate treatment of the older employees will usually react on the younger people as they think ahead and anticipate that they may be in the same position in later years.

27. I am also a believer in staff meetings from time to time. I do not think that this should be on a regular basis as it is vital there should always be a specific subject to discuss, or some information which the management is anxious to pass on to the staff and to give them the opportunity to pose questions. These meetings can be most fruitful in enabling staff to express their views freely, which can often be most illuminating once management have been accepted as trying to achieve the common objective of efficiency, tempered with fair and straightforward treatment.

28. Planning the staff establishment of the future is also important to maintain efficiency. There should always be two or more candidates from within the business for any worth-while job when it becomes vacant. In a large office, the training programme of the young bright members of the staff should be thought out carefully to enable them to obtain experience to justify promotion.

Accuracy versus speed

29. The chartered accountant's training is, for a great part, absorbed with the necessity for accuracy in his work. When auditing, it is often the case that the discovery of a small error will lead to the unveiling of other much more serious mistakes. It is on entry into the business world that there is brought home to the accountant the fact that often speed in the production of information is vitally important to management to enable quick action to be taken in increasing profitability or in the reduction of unnecessary expenses. It is not always easy in one's early days to take the risk, or even to judge the information that is vital. Often, as well, the accountant can fall into the trap of producing information too quickly, which is inaccurate to the extent that wrong decisions may be taken from the figures produced.

30. In the routine of the office, it is often essential that there is completely accurate accountability. Sales invoices for relatively individual small amounts must be accurate to the penny as many minor losses could add up to a large figure; and more especially with invoices involving exports, accuracy is of importance to avoid documents being held up at the ports of entry and goods lying in rented stores. On the other hand the checking of purchases invoices of minor amounts might just not be worth the work involved in checking them in detail.

31. There are many different types of errors which arise in the office. The frequency of occurrence depends upon the nature of the operation and the quality of the staff. I doubt if there has been as yet any substantial amount of thinking in many businesses on the acceptability of error tolerances. In essence, it requires a willingness to balance the time and cost of checking against the benefits realized. The cost of finding and eliminating errors must be compared with the value obtained in pounds, shillings and pence. Naturally, it is important to keep managers in other departments informed generally on the amount of checking which is carried out in the office, as nothing is more irritating than criticism of relatively minor errors which are bound to come to light from time to time.

32. The elimination of checking operations does not mean that there is no review periodically of the need for some checking to be started again. The supervisor of each section must carry out a spot-checking procedure occasionally. This is probably best achieved by establishing a routine whereby he selects one of his staff at random and draws a random sampling of the work done by this individual for review. The supervisor must naturally maintain a record of the checking he has done himself which, as the week or month progresses, builds up into a picture of the work going through his section. By this means it is possible not only to satisfy one's self that there is no need to recommence the checking of the particular work under review, but also enables him to judge the work of any employee by comparison with others and assist in bringing up the standard of any one member of his staff who tends to have a propensity to certain types of errors.

33. In most offices, the pressure on the accountant comes in the production of the periodic profit and loss statement, whether it be weekly, four-weekly, three-monthly, or yearly. There is always constant pressure from directors to produce these statements as quickly as possible after the end of the period. The pressure sometimes leads to the thought that a preliminary result at an early stage may be presented before more accurate figures are available. In my view, it is just as important to resist producing too much at this stage as it is to delay too long to achieve absolute accuracy. Although the accuracy of the results will be tempered to the speed, it is still necessary to be reasonably sure of the figures that are being produced, so as to avoid any serious divergence when the actual results are available.

34. It is important to establish also the use to which the information will be put. The majority of directors are naturally anxious to have information quickly, but it is important that they advise the accountant the use to which they are going to put the information that is supplied to them. A turnover or a profit figure in many instances is pleasing information to have, but unless the director can get on to his sales force immediately or initiate some amendments in policy, it is unfair to expect the accountant to produce these figures at what will probably be extra cost through his office. Similarly, the compilation of periodic lists of expenses for action by directors is only of real use if they are completed on some tangible evidence. This evidence need not necessarily be represented by the invoices, but might well be calculated from internal orders, or other information such as the reading of electricity or gas meters, hours worked by employees, evaluation of stores requisitions and the like.

35. The presentation of information to shareholders or to the outside world demands more accuracy than internal documents. An error in information supplied to the management very seldom does any harm to the name of the business. An error in published accounts, or in accounts supplied to banks or creditors could, if proved subsequently to contain an error, damage the reputation of the business, or any negotiations being carried on at the time. This is not to say that the accountant should expect to achieve absolute accuracy in every balance sheet he produces for shareholders. It is arguable that a large group serves its shareholders far better by the publication of results as soon as possible after the end of its financial year, and that the figures produced to the shareholders will not be misleading if minor items are not included. The practice which has grown up in the last twenty years of eliminating shillings and pence from the balance sheets of smaller companies, and the thousands in the larger groups, has gone a long way to assist the reading of the annual accounts, and it is a practice that should also be developed internally in any business.

36. Speed in production is helped by planning for the time required for any job. The subsequent control of the achievements by the staff enables one first of all to be satisfied that the plan itself is not unrealistic, but also that the original scheduling of all the operations has been carried out effectively.

37. Some of the new techniques which are being applied in the engineering and construction industries are appropriate in a modified way to the routines of the office. Network methods and the preparation of flow charts enable one to pin-point the critical areas in the office work. The pin-pointing of peaks is important so that they can be ironed out and so that arrears of work in one section do not retard the work of another department. The careful arranging of the arrival of work in each part of the office and the orderly control of the backlog, as and when it exists, all assists in speeding up the essential work so that the information that is really required quickly is produced on the agreed date. This is not to say that deadlines may not be modified from time to time, but at least by careful planning one can confine the modifications to the production of information or to the completion of work which has no serious consequence.

Work study

38. Work study is as difficult a task in the office as it is in the factory. Needless to say, it is worth thinking about even in a rudimentary way as conclusions can be reached which indicate clearly the possibility of some improvement in the office routine. For instance, it is practicable by establishing the number of entries to be made in a ledger each day, or each week, to judge if a satisfactory volume of work is being dealt with in that particular section. This is not to say that this quick appreciation always ends up with the expected answer. It may lead to a realization of the amount of ancillary work which is being carried out. It may, however, lead to a reconsideration of the processing of the work and full advantage being taken of mechanizing any routine jobs of substantial volume with the secondary jobs being dealt with by a separate section within the department.

39. Work measurement standards are an essential preliminary to the preparation of an office budget. In my view the budget should reflect not the best possible performance, but one that is to be reasonably expected by the management. Naturally, any improvements expected during the year in the office routines or in the performance and effectiveness of his staff should be built in to that budget. Periodically, during the year, actual results should be compared with the budget and such comments made thereon as necessary if there are any substantial variations. The variance may be due to many factors, such as a change in the volume of work, or high absence rate due to epidemics, or that the changes in the work procedures which were planned at the start of the year have not been put into effect as quickly as was originally planned, or the variance might simply be due to a poor quality of staff engaged during that period.

40. Work measurement in the majority of businesses of any size is mainly the responsibility of the organization and methods department. In most cases, assistance is sought from O. & M. only at the request of the departmental head. This is why it is necessary for the accountant to make some reasonable analysis in the first instance so that he can indicate clearly the lines upon which a consultant from O. & M. should work in his office. It is always important to keep in mind the overall requirements of a business, rather than the needs of one department only. In a large group this is even more important as it is only too easy to recommend changes in the routine of one company which will merely cause work in the office of another company within the same group. I do not think that any of us would worry much about passing work back to our suppliers – or even on occasions to our debtors – but obviously improvements in any one department achieve little if the same amount of work is created in another department within the same company.

41. In many businesses, the traditional methods of work study may be inappropriate because the work is too highly diversified, or because the pressure of time does not permit a detailed study. It is under such circumstances that it is worth considering a broad form of work sampling. It is often possible quickly to analyse, fairly effectively, the work between productive and non-productive activities or, expressed in a different way, direct and indirect activities. In some instances one can quite easily establish the fact that certain activities which account for the major part of the time in an office are relatively useless. The first thought in this sort of circumstance is the removal of work altogether, rather than a too detailed consideration as to methods of improvement. I am sure that many people overlook from time to time that improving the efficiency in the accounts department is another way of saying: remove work which in fact serves no useful purpose or which is so useless as not to be worth the cost of production.

42. Office machines and equipment also need to be considered. Many managers do not know the extent to which office equipment is being used, and for what purpose. If machines are idle, the main causes of idleness should be identified so that efforts can be concentrated upon using them fully. This is not to say that every machine need necessarily have to be used for a hundred per cent of the office time. An adding, a calculating, or a duplicating machine may pay for itself if used for only part of the office hours; however, the accountant may contribute to their fuller use by making them available to other departments whose volume of work may not justify the purchase of a machine, but where the use of one may contribute some saving of clerical time to that other department.

43. Another aspect of office routine which might be uncovered by work sampling is the identification of peaks and valleys of work activity. In this context, it is vital to consider the real needs of the business for highest profitability. Sales departments, in particular, can often be demanding in the speed with which orders are executed and invoices sent to customers. In some instances daily processing of work may be vital, but in many cases an irregular flow during any period of days may often be smoothed out, so far as the office is concerned, without detriment in any way to sales. On the other hand the company may be concerned largely with exports overseas where the processing of documents – to ensure availability at the port of unloading before the goods arrive – is a necessity in order to avoid extra storage expenses to the client.

44. Sampling must, however, be reliable; this means that there must be a certain immediate number of observations, but there is a point beyond which additional observations are not justified by the relatively small increase in certainty that they would give us.

45. The observations comprising a reliable sample must also be at random. The sample must cover a period of time sufficient to include currencies of all types of work for which the office being studied is normally responsible. The nature of the operation will also influence how frequently the observations should be made. Thus, a reliable sample is one which comprises a sufficiently large number of random observations taken over a period of time, and at a frequency that includes an exposure to all types of duties being dealt with in the office.

Should Shareholders Approve Directors' Remuneration?

by J. D. B. OLIVER, B.A.(Lond.), B.A.(Cantab.), A.C.A.

THE subject of directors' remuneration has been much in the news recently. In February the abortive Companies Bill proposed a limited extension to the disclosure of emoluments, and later the Garda Trust and Second Premier Investment Trust incentive schemes drew attention to the need for full disclosure of remuneration and benefits enjoyed by directors.

Then, in June, the Federation of Stock Exchanges announced that, as part of the revised requirements for new quotations, directors' service contracts should be available for inspection during a limited period in each year. At the same time, the Chairman of the London Stock Exchange expressed the Council's disapproval of Garda-type schemes unless they have been approved [sic] by shareholders.

Finally, the Prime Minister announced in his 'mini-budget' speech to the House of Commons on July 20th that companies would be required to publish details of the fees and salaries of directors and high executives, with comparable figures for the previous year, and the White Paper on the Prices and Incomes Standstill confirms that a provision to this effect will be included in the forthcoming Companies Bill.

These moves have gone a long way towards satisfying the need for company law reform in this direction, but they have concentrated (with the exception of the Stock Exchange Chairman's comments) on the disclosure of directors' remuneration, etc., and have not touched on the problem of who should fix the remuneration in the first place. It is this problem which it is proposed to examine here.

Self-determined

The Cohen Committee, reporting in 1945, found that under the Companies Act 1929:

'Where the board consists entirely of executive directors, the result may be that their own remuneration is fixed by themselves, without the impartial judgement of any independent directors and without any obligation of disclosure.'

They therefore recommended disclosure of the remuneration paid, distinguishing amounts paid for services as a director (i.e. director's fees) from amounts paid for other services; section 196 of the Companies Act 1948 gave effect to this recommendation.

When the question of disclosure came before Parliament again earlier this year in the Companies Bill 1966, Mr Peter Shore, M.P., said during the second reading of the Bill,

'... when one is dealing with this particular group of people (directors) one is dealing with people whose rewards are largely self-determined. This is very different from the position of most people running public corporations, or in almost any other walk of life. There is, therefore, a particular obligation to disclose.' [italics supplied.]

I think most people would be in agreement with this statement and there does not appear to be much argument now over the need for greater disclosure; but little thought has been given to the problem of whether it should be the members or the directors who should fix the directors' remuneration.

Disclosure loses much of its effectiveness if, when the figures have been disclosed, there is nothing that anybody can do about the state of affairs thus revealed. For example, suppose that it is shown that the directors' remuneration is excessive. The money will have been paid already and cannot be recovered at law in the absence of fraud or unjust enrichment. Nor can the shareholders vote to reduce the remuneration in the future for they have no power to act in this way. Their only remedy is the removal of the directors (or the threat of this) – a rather drastic measure which will probably do more harm than good. Disclosure alone is therefore only effective in so far as the directors may be influenced by regard for public opinion, either following the disclosure or in anticipation of it.

Directors are often spoken of as agents of, or trustees for, the shareholders – they hold a fiduciary position. An agent is not permitted to make a secret profit in dealing with his principal, while a trustee is not permitted any remuneration save as allowed by his cestui que trust. The notions of trusteeship and agency have indeed been imported into company law as regards directors', and particularly promoters', duties but it is unfortunate that they have not been extended to the question of directors' remuneration, so as to require members' approval.

Open to abuse

Furthermore, it is paradoxical that while members have no control over directors' salaries, etc., the directors alone have power to fix the dividends payable. Companies' articles usually provide that the directors may pay such interim dividends as appear to them to be justified by the profits and that no dividend, interim or final, shall exceed the rate recommended by the directors (cf. Table A – Articles 114 and 115). This can lead to directors abusing their position at the expense of shareholders. For example, in evidence to the Jenkins Committee on Company Law<sup>1</sup> Mr S. R. Hogg, F.C.A., referred to the large number of family companies where the second or third generation are now on the board running the company and have quarrelled with other members of the family among the shareholders. They are able to pay a low rate of dividend while drawing excessive remuneration themselves and there is little the shareholders can do about it.

Of course, it may be that if the directors had a controlling interest they would be able to approve their remuneration in general meeting anyway, were that required – but then an effective controlling interest can be as low as, say, 35 per cent of the voting power, even in a family company. The restrictions which the Finance Act 1965 has placed on allowable directors' remuneration for tax purposes in the case of 'close' companies may have tended to check this abuse; but one should not have to rely on fiscal legislation to remedy defects of company law.

Cogent criticism of the present state of the law has come from Professor Gower who states in his report on the Company Law of Ghana (1961):

'Hitherto the normal practice in the Commonwealth has been to distinguish between directors' fees, and salaries (etc.) payable to executive directors . . . this tends to produce an absurd situation, especially where nearly all the directors hold executive offices. The members solemnly resolve that the directors shall receive, say, £G500 each. The latter then appoint themselves joint managing directors at salaries of £G5,000 each. The members have no say at all in the amount of these salaries and do not even know about them. At the most they later find out from the accounts what the total sum is that has been paid to the directors. However excessive they may think this sum, there is very little they can do about it.'

To deal with this Professor Gower included a section in the draft Code, since enacted as the Ghana Companies Code 1963, which runs as follows:

'194 (1) Subject as hereinafter provided in this section,<sup>2</sup> the fees and other remuneration payable to the directors in whatsoever capacity, shall be determined from time to time by ordinary resolution of the company, and not by any provision in the regulations or in any agreement,<sup>3</sup> which provision shall be null and void.'

In the report of the Jenkins Committee there is no discussion of the possibility of a similar section being enacted in England, but in the course of hearing evidence Professor Gower, as a member of that committee, asked the Institute of Directors for their views on such a proposal.<sup>4</sup> The Institute replied that they did not think it would be workable in practice and pointed to the difficulty of engaging executive directors if their salary could not be definitely settled until an extraordinary general meeting of the members had approved the figure.

Shareholder approval

The writer feels that this objection, although valid, does not outweigh the arguments in favour of shareholder approval and submits that there is a strong case for the enactment of a provision along the lines of that contained in the Ghana Companies Code. This would have the following consequences:

- (i) It would apply to all companies and not just to public companies. This is essential because one of the abuses which it is designed to remedy (see above) occurs mainly in the case of private companies.
- (ii) Shareholders would be required to approve the remuneration and benefits in kind etc., of individual directors. Remuneration and benefits should receive a wide definition here so as to include all fringe benefits – and those at present 'beyond the fringe' such as Garda type schemes.
- (iii) Following from (i) the remuneration etc., of individual directors would have to be disclosed to shareholders; not just the income 'band' but the actual amount or value of benefit which it is proposed to pay.
- (iv) The vexed problem of service contracts would be dealt with once and for all. All such contracts would have to be approved by shareholders before they became operative.

The proposal is not put forward because it is believed that directors' pay is, in general, excessive. There are the odd cases, as revealed for example by the British Printing Corporation affair, but in general the level is probably below what it should be. As Mr George Darling, Minister of State, Board of Trade, suggested in the debate on the second reading of the 1966 Companies Bill:

'... far too many executive directors in British industry – especially among medium-sized firms – are not getting the proper rate for the job'.

He went on to add:

'the revealing of directors' pay will, we think, help to put a stop to clearly excessive emoluments, and for the run of hard-working executives the consequences may be very different from what some critics expect'.

Impact on salary levels

The result of requiring disclosure to and approval by shareholders may well be a general rise in salary levels for directors. Mr Leslie Coulthard, of P.A. Management Consultants Ltd, in an interesting analysis<sup>5</sup> has

concluded that disclosure of individual remuneration will result in shareholders calling for higher salaries to be paid in order to obtain and keep the best men.<sup>6</sup> He points out that in America the disclosure of remuneration has had this 'reverse' effect of boosting pay rather than cutting it.

Another firm of management consultants, HAY-MSL, have also commented that publication of emoluments<sup>6</sup> of senior executives and directors

'could well prove to have a considerable long-term beneficial effect on productivity through managerial effectiveness if it stimulates companies to ensure that their salary policies provide a realistic relationship between the pay and accountability of their management jobs, and if salary increases to individuals depend upon successful performance in meeting job objectives'.

The question of the amount of directors' pay is really quite separate from the question of who should fix the pay; but this digression shows that disclosure may, at the same time as 'putting a stop to clearly excessive emoluments', result in a general rise in salary levels for directors and that the object of the proposal is not to reduce directors' pay.

On the prospect of early legislation along the lines suggested, it must be admitted that the proposed measure is rather avant-garde; the likely development in the law is, first, to require the proper disclosure of service contracts and then later to require that together with all other remuneration they should receive the approval of shareholders before becoming effective. This may take some time but a small start on the first has been made with the introduction of the Stock Exchange's new requirements for quotation.

Of course, the Government, with an eye to the incomes policy, might well consider such a measure as a means of curbing increases in directors' salaries, etc. However, this would be the right move for the wrong motives and the proposal is not put forward on the grounds that it is necessary for the enforcement of the incomes policy. Rather it is argued that if one accepts the present underlying concept of company law and of shareholder control, then just as the members have power to appoint and remove directors, so they should have the power to fix the directors' remuneration.

Tax Conference at Lisbon

Twentieth Congress of the International Fiscal Association

OVER five hundred tax experts with as many accompanying guests, from twenty-six countries, attended the twentieth congress of the International Fiscal Association at Lisbon earlier this month. The opening ceremonies and the whole of the working sessions took place at the Aula Magna in the Rectory of the University.

Inaugural session

Professor Marcello Caetano gave the inaugural address, in which he referred to the strong support given to the organizers of the congress by the Portuguese Government, the University of Lisbon, and the Lisbon municipality. He commented on the fact that the taxpayer in modern society realized that he derived advantages by way of social and public benefits from the payment of taxes, but that he nevertheless expected taxes to be applied justly.

If taxes were excessive, unjust, arbitrary, and complicated, they could effectively prevent the progress of society. The more powerful the machinery of State that backed up the taxes, the more necessary it became for lawyers to fight for the limitations laid down by law to the powers of the State, and for the liberty of the individual. Professor Caetano referred to the fact that the discussions at the congress were carried on by university professors and lawyers, by economists and business men, by practising tax experts and by members of the various tax administrations.

During the inaugural session, an address was given by Professor J. J. Teixeira Ribeiro, of the Coimbra Faculty of Law, on the constitutional principles of Portuguese taxation. The bases of his lecture were unlikely to be acceptable to any denizen of Westminster. Professor Ribeiro said that the principle of fiscal legality did not, in Portugal, have its traditional meaning of self-taxation by the citizenry. Taxes could be levied either by a law emanating from the National Assembly or by Government decree not subject to ratification. The Assembly could not reduce State revenue and therefore taxes imposed by Government decree could not be revoked or reduced by the National Assembly. What he was saying, in fact, was that the Portuguese Assembly had as little control of the fiscal system as the Westminster backbencher.

Fiscal problems of associations of States

The subject-matter of the first working session was 'Fiscal problems resulting from international integration movements in associations or communities of States'. The president of the session was Mr Alun G. Davies, a Vice-President of the International Fiscal Association and Chairman of the British Branch. As the general reporter, Professor Soares Martinez, was unavoidably absent through illness, his place was taken by Dr Paulo Pitta-e-Cunha, a young Portuguese economist who impressed the congress by his command of the subject, and by his effective use of both French and English in his introductory review.

In the debate that took place on the first subject, contributions were made by Professor Dan Throop Smith (U.S.A.), Dr E. W. Klimowsky (Israel), Dr. Romualda Cerato (Italy), Dr Hans Gerber (Switzerland), Dr Alvaro Marlo de Carvalho (Portugal), Mr Gad Kitron (Israel), Dr Rodrigo Guimaraes (Portugal), Dr Cidreiro Lopez (Portugal), Dr J. C. L. Huiskamp (Netherlands), Dr Valdez Costa (Uruguay), Professor Van den Tempel (Netherlands), Mr A. Aylmer (United Kingdom), Dr Fischer (Germany), Professor Cardyn (Belgium), Professor Eggert Møller (Denmark), Professor Antal (Netherlands), Dr Debatin (Germany), and Dr Reig (Argentina).

Harmonization of taxation

Dr Verloren van Themaat, a director-general at the European Economic Community, was specially invited by the president of the session to speak to the congress on the work of the E.E.C. Commission on the harmonization of taxation, and he gave an account of the practical progress which the commission had made in the fields of both direct and indirect taxation.

When the question of a resolution on the subject was discussed in plenary session, the Resolutions Committee pointed out the impossibility of arriving at conclusions in the form of resolutions. The theme was too complex, the national experiences on the subject of taxation were too wide, and there had been a variety of approaches to the subject of integration. Practical directives could not be presented, and a summary was agreed by the plenary session of the main points discussed, as follows:

- (i) There had been a preponderant emphasis to date on the need for eliminating distortions in the movements of goods, arising from the incidence of indirect taxes; it was considered that it was necessary to examine to what extent distortions, especially in regard to movements of capital, could arise from the incidence of direct taxes. During the discussion, reference was made to the possibility that the distinction between direct and indirect taxes was ambiguous, and several speakers referred to the need for further research into the problem of shifting of direct taxes into the prices of goods.
- (ii) While there was fairly general support for the elimination of cumulative cascade taxes, the view was expressed that tax on added-value was not necessarily the only solution for the harmonization of turnover taxes; an alternative was possible by way of a single-stage tax, which might permit greater flexibility, while eliminating unwanted distortions.
- (iii) Attention was drawn to the position of developing countries outside integration movements, and to the need to avoid weakening the relative position of the economies of such countries.

(iv) There was also discussion of the position of developed countries not participating in international integration movements and the possibility that they might need to arrange their policies to take note of community or association tax changes, even if only for purposes of self-protection.

(v) There was general recognition that in the pursuit of tax harmonization within international integration movements, there were formidable difficulties arising out of different social economic and political aims, differences in administrative structures, and the separate historical development of each country; it was also emphasized that the individual elements and human problems should never be forgotten.

The cahiers containing the general report on the first subject and thirteen national reports, constituted the raw material on which the debate was based. All the reports were well-written, but at the risk of making odious comparisons, it can be said that the United States report by Dr Peggy Musgrave and the French report by M de la Martinière, were both in their respective ways, brilliant, and cannot be neglected by any serious student of the subject. The Dutch report, by Dr J. Reugebrink, was a first-class presentation of the Dutch minority position in Common Market harmonization. The British report, by Mr Frederick H. Seale, F.C.A., reflected very clearly the tantalizing state of the British tax situation.

Fiscal treatment of stock dividends

The second subject of discussion at the Congress was the fiscal treatment of stock dividends and its international repercussions. The president of session was Dr Vitor Faveiro, Director-General of Contributions and Taxes at the Portuguese Ministry of Finance, and the general reporter was Professor Hans Herold, of Switzerland. The British national report, presented by Mr Richard F. Hayllar, F.C.A., was a clear and concise statement.

In his presentation of the subject, Professor Herold commented on the inaccuracy of references to 'free' shares; realistically there was no 'gift' and this was recognized in many countries, so that there was generally no fiscal penalty on the issue of scrip bonuses. Distribution of portfolio shares by way of a scrip issue was a more complicated problem, as was shown by the special legislation in the U.S.A. on the Du Pont distribution of its General Motors portfolio following an anti-trust decree.

The resolution on the second subject stated that whenever reserves were converted into share capital in proportion to existing shareholders, there should be no imposition of tax. Where, however, shares were issued so that a shareholder received money or money's worth, a levy of tax was justifiable, especially where capital was subsequently reduced or shares were redeemed, or where shares were issued, at the option of the shareholder, in lieu of a dividend. A levy of tax was also justified if the proportion of shareholdings was altered by the issue of bonus shares. Where issues took place across the frontiers, the law of the shareholder's domicile should be followed, as a rule, unless there were special circumstances under which the shares were issued in the country of domicile of the issuing company.

Other topics

Following a precedent of the London Congress of 1965 where a session was held on the new British taxes, a session was set apart for a seminar on the Portuguese fiscal system and a handbook was produced in all the congress languages on the 'new look' in the Portuguese tax system.

Lectures were also given by Mr Jacobus van Hoorn, Jr managing director of the International Bureau of Fiscal Documentation, on 'International fiscal law and the financing of enterprises', and by Professor Sainz de Bujanc of the Madrid Faculty of Law on the subject of 'The methodological positions of lawyers and economists on fiscal matters and the possible forms of co-operation between the two perspectives'.

By courtesy of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, the latest volume from the O.E.C.D. Fiscal Committee, a draft double taxation convention on estates and inheritances was circulated to all members of the congress.

For each day of congress, a daily newspaper was published in French as the Journal du XXIème Congrès International de droit financier et fiscal, on the lines of the precedent of the London Congress of 1965, where by courtesy of Taxation, a daily newspaper recorded the speeches on social occasions.

Social activities

As a set-off to the solid intellectual efforts in the working sessions, congress members were invited to a reception by the President of the Municipal Chamber of Lisbon at the Parque Florestal de Monsanto. There was also a concert at the National Theatre S. Carlos, and an excursion in the Lisbon countryside. At the close of the congress, a banquet was held at the Pavillon of the International Fair of Lisbon.

Next year's congress will be held at Stockholm, from August 21st to 25th, 1967 (just before Sweden changes the rule of the road from left to right). The two subjects for discussion will be:

- (i) Tax changes as a means of stabilization: technical and legal implications.
- (ii) The evolution of the 'permanent establishment' concept, especially from the viewpoint of harmonization in future double tax treaties.

The 1968 congress will be held at Montevideo in October at the invitation of the Uruguayan branch of I.F.A., where the two subjects for discussion will be:

- (i) The basis for a fiscal system in underdeveloped countries.
- (ii) The limits of territorial competence of a fiscal system in inheritance, succession, and wealth taxes.

Information regarding the International Fiscal Association and the Bureau of Fiscal Documentation may be obtained from the secretary of the British Branch, Mr G. Bellenie, 6 St James's Square, London SW1.

SOUTH AFRICA

New Banknote Issue

THE changes in the design of banknotes in South Africa, originally contemplated when the country's currency was decimalized in 1961, have been finally effected. The main feature of the new notes is that they are much reduced in size and thus are more convenient to stow away in and extract from pocket wallets and handbags.

A new R10 note (equivalent to £5 value) has been in circulation for some months. It is much reduced in size and of a completely different design and colouring to the existing R10 note which is gradually being withdrawn by the South African Reserve Bank. New R1 and R5 banknotes which were issued in the middle of August have soon come into circulation.

The R1 note is brown in colour and features a protea – South Africa's national floral emblem – on one side, with an agricultural scene on the reverse side. The R5 (£2 10s) note makes local currency history as South Africa has never had a note of that denomination before. It is of a violet colour and has the national Voortrekker Monument of Pretoria as its main motif with a mining scene on the reverse side.

There will not be a note for R2 (the old £1 note) in circulation in South Africa for very much longer – like the existing R10 note it is being withdrawn gradually by the Reserve Bank.

At its last session before the dissolution, Parliament enacted an amendment to the Coinage Act abandoning the 'tickey' – South Africa's much loved threepenny bit – as a coin and the 'tickey' has now almost completely disappeared from the South African scene. The complete range of new coins of greatly reduced size and weight is now in free circulation in the country and has met with a favourable reception.

The latest issue of newly designed banknotes now completes the whole scheme for reducing South Africa's coins and banknotes to a more convenient and useful size.

Publicity for the Profession

A NEW booklet has recently been issued by the Joint Council of the Societies of Chartered Accountants of South Africa entitled You Need a Chartered Accountant.

The booklet is intended to bring to the public notice the services which chartered accountants in South Africa are able to offer to individuals and to all businesses, large and small, as well as in the commercial, industrial and financial fields. It draws attention not only to services available in the normal spheres of auditing, accounting and taxation but to other activities in the role of financial expert, investment adviser, designer of accounting systems and general management accountant and consultant.

All South African chartered accountants have received a copy of the booklet and ample supplies are available for them to distribute to their clients and other interested persons. In this way the booklet is achieving a fairly wide circulation and is quietly performing a distinct service to the profession in South Africa.

Computers for Congress

IT is reported in The Journal of Accountancy for July that Representative William S. Moorhead has proposed that Congress establish a 'central read-out facility that could tap the memory banks of all the other computers in the Federal Government'. The system would have remote stations in every member's office and in every committee office. Read-out devices of closed circuit television screens could be placed in the offices of senators and representatives. Information retrieval might be by push-button control. The American Institute is said to have proposed an information system and professional staff to assist Congressional committees.

Tomorrow's Management

IN an article in the July 1st issue of Fortune, Mr Max Ways supports strongly the view, which he attributes to Professor H. Igor Ansoff of the Carnegie Institute of Technology, that there are three trends in the business environment: (1) product dynamics – the life cycles of products will become shorter; (2) market dynamics – as superior technology displaces it from its traditional markets, the firm has to fight back by looking for new pastures; (3) firm and society – the firm's search for profit will be strongly affected by an awareness of social consequences.

The firm of the future will, he says, be able to programme many of its activities, thus releasing management to deal with the increasing load of non-programmable decisions that will confront it in the new environment.

Mr Ways cites the increasing sense that management is the chief asset of the corporation rather than an overhead expense. He illustrates from Sears Roebuck and Polaroid.

The former, he says, has for long tried to identify, as early as possible, those individuals with a high potential for development; and Polaroid has used a 'posting' system in which its men are encouraged to compete for forthcoming job vacancies.

By the year 2,000, he concludes, there will be hundreds of thousands, perhaps millions, of Americans whose influence on the quality of life in their more fluid society will be greater than that of any past 'captain of industry'.

CANADA

New President of Canadian Institute

MR J. R. M. WILSON, F.C.A., senior partner in the firm of Clarkson, Gordon & Co, Chartered Accountants, of Toronto, was elected President of The Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants for 1966-67 at the Institute's annual conference held at the end of last month in Regina, Saskatchewan, and reported elsewhere in this issue.

Educated at public schools in Vancouver, Kingston and Toronto, Mr Wilson graduated from the University of Toronto with a Bachelor of Arts degree in political science (economics) in 1929. He was articled to his present firm a year later, admitted a member of The Institute of Chartered Accountants of Ontario in 1934, and became a partner in the firm in 1941.

An active participant in the affairs of the Canadian Institute at both provincial and national levels, Mr Wilson has served as chairman on many of its committees. In 1962 he was the Institute's delegate to the Eighth International Congress of Accountants in New York and last year led the Canadian delegation at the Fourth Conference of Asian and Pacific Accountants in New Delhi. From 1956-57 Mr Wilson was President of The Institute of Chartered Accountants of Ontario.

He is a member of the Senate of the University of Toronto and of the Advisory Board of the School of Business for Queen's University, Kingston, Ontario.

Mr R. W. Manning, F.C.A., of Charlottetown, has been elected First Vice-President of the Institute and Mr M. G. Graves, F.C.A., of Calgary, has been elected Second Vice-President.

Canadian Institute's Annual Report

THE recently published annual report of The Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants shows that at April 30th last, membership of the Institute totalled 14,363 - a rise of 808 over the previous year's figure.

In common with other organizations in Canada, the Institute has felt the impact of the increased rate of inflation, states the report. Many sources of revenue other than fees have been successfully developed without increasing members' subscriptions, which, in fact, in recent years have accounted for no more than 25 to 29 per cent of the Institute's gross income. Due, however, to fluctuations in its other revenues and the fact that the increased loss over the budgeted loss last year resulted almost entirely from the sharp fall in its other sources of income, the Council, after careful deliberation, approved an increase in the members' annual fee of $7.50 to $27.50, effective from May 1st, last. Even after this increase, members' fees are still lower than those of other professional bodies in Canada and comparable bodies in the United States. But the report warns that a further increase will undoubtedly be necessary next year.

During the year under review committees of the Institute were active in legislation matters. The Bankruptcy Legislation Committee are continuing to work closely with the Department of Justice on improvements to the Bankruptcy Act and its administration, and for the first time, the Taxation Committee submitted its views on the Minister of Finance's Budget resolutions. The encouraging reaction by the Minister to the committee's recommendations make it highly likely, the report states, that similar representation will be carried on in the future.

In other spheres, a special committee on computers was established with wide terms of reference during a meeting of the Executive Committee in April to assess the desired education and roles of the chartered accountant of the future in the computer era. It is anticipated that the study should be completed next year.

Several research studies are now in various stages of completion including studies on finance companies and fund accounting. In addition, two other important studies are being carried out by the Research Committee - in accounting principles and on auditing standards.

Data Centres

AN article in Canadian Business for July refers to the data centres which are rapidly multiplying in Canada. The Association of Data Processing Service Organizations estimates that the annual gross billing for data-processing centres in the United States and Canada is $600 million and will be $1 billion by 1970. The manpower situation will ease, says the author of the article, Miss Sonja Sinclair, as schools and universities introduce data processing as a subject. The Ontario Department of Education is using computerized instruction to train teachers for a data-processing high-school course which is to begin this autumn.

Miss Sinclair tells of I.B.M.'s Quiktran which is to be introduced in September. Up to fifty-five clients in scattered locations will have what appears to be simultaneous access to the one computer, though in fact it will give its attention to each client in succession for a fraction of a second. Each user will punch his problem on his terminal machine, receive his instructions or answers, and proceed with his work. With this introduction of time-sharing, concludes the writer, we are one step nearer the stage where the computer will be as accessible as the telephone.

Review of U.E.C.

ARECENT article in Economie et Comptabilité, by AM Emmanuel Archavlis, Honorary President of the Société des Experts Comptables and a member of the Executive Committee of the U.E.C., reviews the fifteen years' work of the Union Européenne des Experts Comptables Economiques et Financiers from its foundation to the present day. While it deals particularly with the contributions to U.E.C. made by the French accountancy bodies, it includes much of general interest.

The U.E.C. came into being largely as the result of the initiative and imaginative thinking of the late M Paul Caujolle, the promoter and moving spirit of the International Congress of Accountants held in Paris in 1948, who regarded it as unthinkable that the interchange of ideas at that gathering should not be continued on a permanent basis. A meeting of delegates at Brussels last November paid tribute to his memory by including among the new statutes adopted, one which conferred on 'Paul Caujolle, first President and subsequently Honorary President of the U.E.C.' the posthumous title of Founder-President.

The main themes of the U.E.C. congresses held successively in Florence, Brussels, Nice, Zürich and Vienna are briefly described, and the words of Pope Pius XII when receiving the members at the Florence Congress are recalled. He 'welcomed with joy this new effort at international co-operation' and in speaking of accountants referred to their wide culture, penetrating minds and devotion to their profession. The fourth congress at Zürich in 1961 was the first at which British observers were present, and at the fifth congress in Vienna two years ago British participants, together with representatives from the profession in the Netherlands and Scandinavia, attended for the first time.

The next congress was due to be held in 1967 but that being the year of the International Congress of Accountants in Paris, the U.E.C. meeting has been postponed until 1969. Study days are to be held next November in Baden-Baden, when there will be study groups led by chairmen and rapporteurs appointed by the member organizations.

Since 1958 the U.E.C. has had advisory status in the Council of Europe and in this capacity it has solemnly undertaken in its own name and in the names of the affiliated national bodies to maintain, within the framework of its specific activities, the task of furthering the progressive unification of the Continent of Europe.

Beautility changes

THE layout of the accounts of Beautility Ltd, from which this week's reprint comes, tends to put one in mind of the person who, having been behind the times, makes a determined effort to be contemporary only to find that the fashion has changed again. Beautility has introduced separate dual-sided balance sheets to combined group and parent columnar accounts to a single narrative.

Some years ago the dual-account single narrative fashion gained quite a few adherents, but difficulties entailed in the positioning of the narrative and the distance the eye has to travel from narrative to figures, together with layout complications once the figures became in the slightest degree complicated, showed that in the majority of cases clarity was best achieved by separate group and parent accounts. Clarity is hardly achieved by the Beautility presentation which, in the original, is spread over a double quarto page opening.

But the new form of account has the attribute of presenting the group's financial position in the modern idiom of capital employed and employment of capital. The previous accounts left shareholders to work out the net current asset arithmetic for themselves, but even on that unsatisfactory basis, the presentation was clearer than it is in the latest layout.

Housing Division's loss

The volume of information provided for shareholders this year is increased by the provision of a ten-year record which is included in one reprint.

The company has been considerably broadened and developed in recent years and is currently operated in five divisions: housing, carpet, veneer and timber, furniture and kitchen, and, finally, engineering. The latest accounts provide an indication of individual divisional earnings only to the extent that the loss by the housing division is shown separately. Last year there was no such division.

One wonders whether there would have been a division this year had the housing division continued to make a profit. The division is represented by Calders Ltd which is concerned with industrialized housing under the Calder Homes name. The directors, states the chairman, Mr Rupert White, F.C.A., are 'giving serious consideration to the future of this division, and the necessary steps have already been taken which would enable this project to contribute to profits in the current financial year'.

A point on which a decided step has been taken elsewhere is that 'in view of the appreciation in value of freehold properties', no depreciation is to be written off these assets this year and in future. The extent to which inflation offsets depreciation or renders it unnecessary is a nice one and depends very much on the asset concerned - property clearly being one.

Keith Prowse turnover

KEITH PROWSE is a name to conjure with in the realm of theatre tickets, but for the first time the company's travel and freight business has overtaken ticket turnover and shareholders in the company must presumably conjure the Keith Prowse name with far away places rather than London's theatreland.

In the year to last March, turnover from travel and freight approached £3 million and the company, Mr Peter Cadbury, the chairman, says, is 'now amongst the largest independent travel organizations in the country with our business extending from the simplest of British Railway tickets to complicated itineraries for important business executives and the freightage of the most specialized cargoes'.

Theatre ticket turnover was £2,290,000 – 'almost exactly the same as last year'. Mr Cadbury has many times criticized what he calls the 'attempts of the avant garde to bore or shock people out of the theatres'. There is no doubt in his mind that 'the average theatregoer still wishes to be amused and entertained'.

Gramophone record sales of £405,000 made up the total Keith Prowse turnover but what improved the trading profit to £166,445 (a rise of over 10 per cent on the year) Mr Cadbury does not say. From his comment on the intense difficulty of making a profit on travel and freight business it looks as though the ticket agency business is the breadwinner. Perhaps next year Mr Cadbury will be prepared to break down profits as well as turnover.

The future

Having reviewed the activities of the organization, Mr Cadbury, later in his statement, goes on to broader issues of Government policy and its possible effect. In doing so he follows the generally accepted form of company chairman's statements but, under current conditions, there is room to doubt whether this form really serves any useful purpose.

The form is that the chairman says, in effect, that it would be foolish, irresponsible or, what you will, for anyone to attempt to forecast what the current year holds because of the 'unknowns' in the economic equation. There follows a 'recap' of Government policy including, in some cases, dire warnings about the state of affairs if such and such circumstances should arise.

The statement then invariably turns from the inky blackness of this situation to a blinding shaft of confidence in the company's own particular ability to keep its business and its earnings unflagging and in its brilliant 'long-term future'. Mr Cadbury, it must be said, does not go as far along this verbal trail as some but he treads it none the less.

Under present circumstances no one can hold it against any company chairman for not knowing what results he is likely to be able to put before shareholders twelve months hence. But it would be better for those chairmen bold enough to admit that they don't know, simply to say so and leave it at that.

Excuse me Col. Pugh!

Would you mind telling readers of The Accountant how you came to be on this Safari?

“Not at all – 14 years ago I popped £3,000 in Abbey National, gratuity mostly. Interest alone came to £1,700, plenty for this little trip. Shan't touch the capital though. Why Abbey National? High return [now 4% with the Society paying the income tax] and security.”

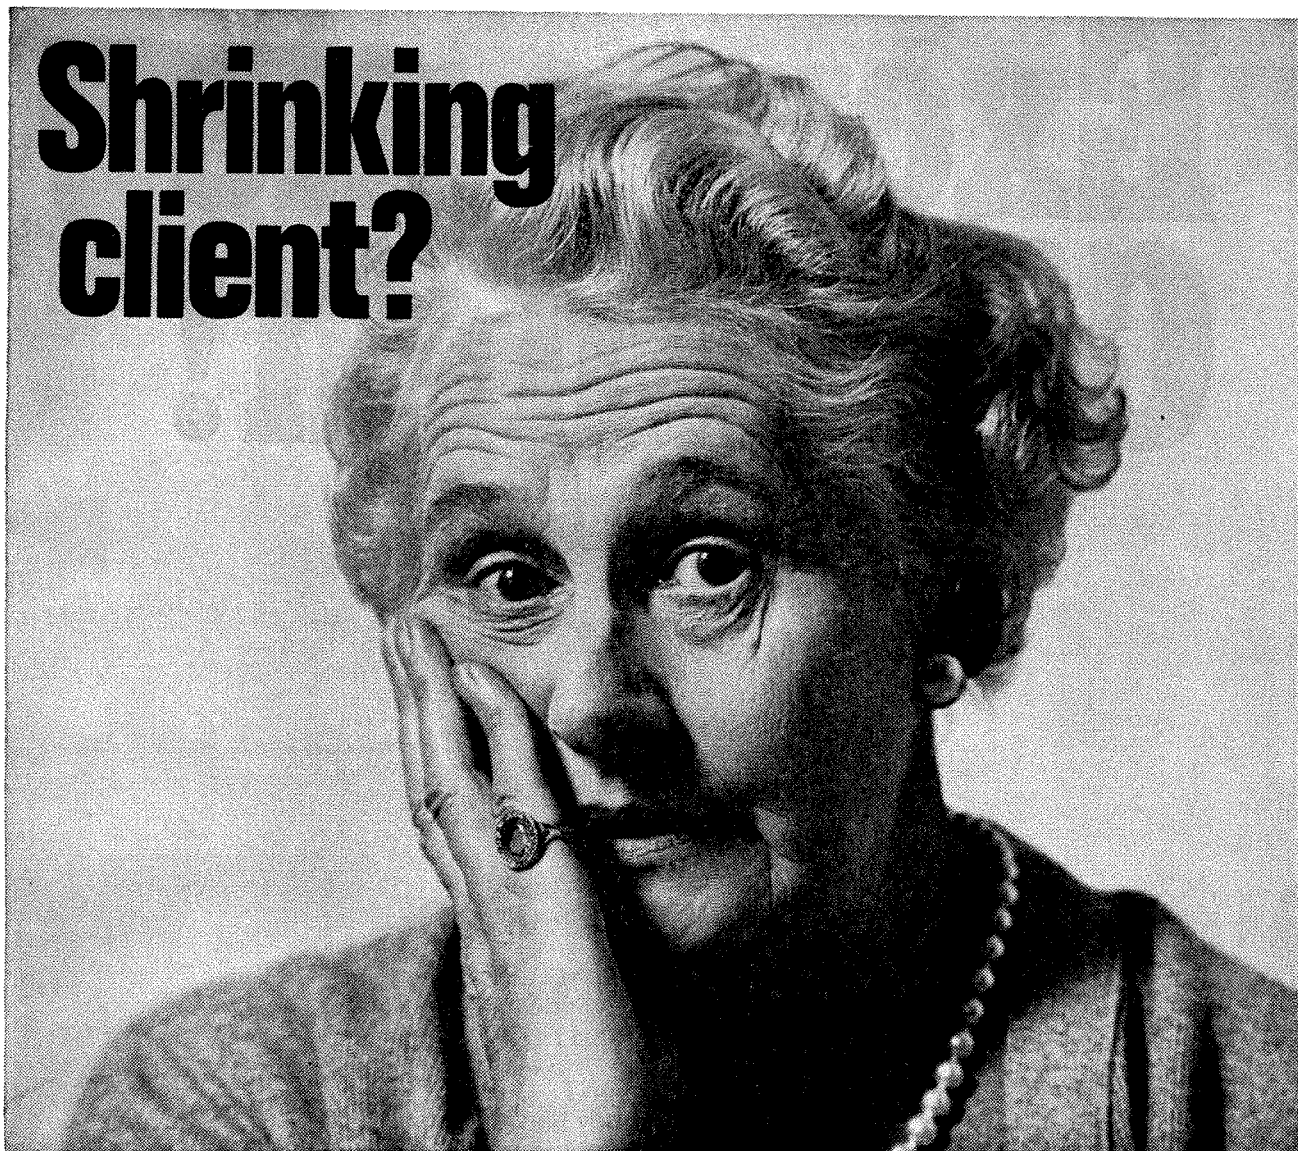

Colonel Pugh and a whole army of over 1,000,000 members rely on Abbey National.

SOUTH EASTERN SOCIETY OF CHARTERED ACCOUNTANTS Students' Residential Course

The first part of the seventeenth students' residential course arranged by the South Eastern Society of Chartered Accountants was held at the Royal Pavilion, Brighton, from September 12th to 16th (Final course). Nearly one hundred students attended.

The course was introduced by Mr W. H. Minter, F.C.A., Past President of the Society. Mr Arthur H. Walton, F.C.A., a member of the Council of the Institute, and Mr F. C. Davey, President of the Society, spoke at the course dinner. The Society also welcomed students' society officers and principals of articled clerks to the dinner and other functions.

The high quality of all the lectures and meetings, and the formal and informal discussions which followed them received the full approval of the students who found it very beneficial to be able to supplement their normal studies and professional work by expert personal tuition.

It is felt by the organizers that considerably more students will wish to attend future courses if the educational and social success of this one can be maintained, and it is hoped that their attendance will again be facilitated as much as possible by the very willing co-operation given by their principals on these and previous occasions.

The second part of the course, for Intermediate students, will be held at the Royal Pavilion, Brighton, from December 5th to 9th. Students within the area of the South Eastern and Southern Societies of Chartered Accountants will receive, nearer the time, individual notifications regarding these courses. particular stress being laid upon the need for an expansionist attitude for long-term survival. Some of the problems of diversification were mentioned. He also dealt with the financial role in business expansion, the importance of measuring results being stressed.

Investment appraisal methods and the relationship between them were discussed with an eye to greater precision on setting financial objectives. An appendix to the paper contained a brief survey of the last ten years of the particular business with which the speaker is connected, to provide members with some idea of the circumstances which influenced the speaker's thoughts.

Communications

The final address on 'The importance of communications' was given on Monday by Mr B. J. A. Hargreaves, director of public affairs, I.B.M. (U.K.) Ltd, who stressed the importance of understanding, the fact that most people are only really concerned with how they are affected themselves, the various media of communication, and the lines of communication (including the 'grapevine').

On Monday afternoon a golf competition was held against bogey over the Eden Course. The leading scores returned were:

G. J. Carter and R. Alexander (13) .. ..	6 up
J. W. Dallachy and N. S. Thomson } .. ..	2 up
Maurice Crichton and L. S. Leask }

Mr J. C. Hewitt was the winner of a putting competition.

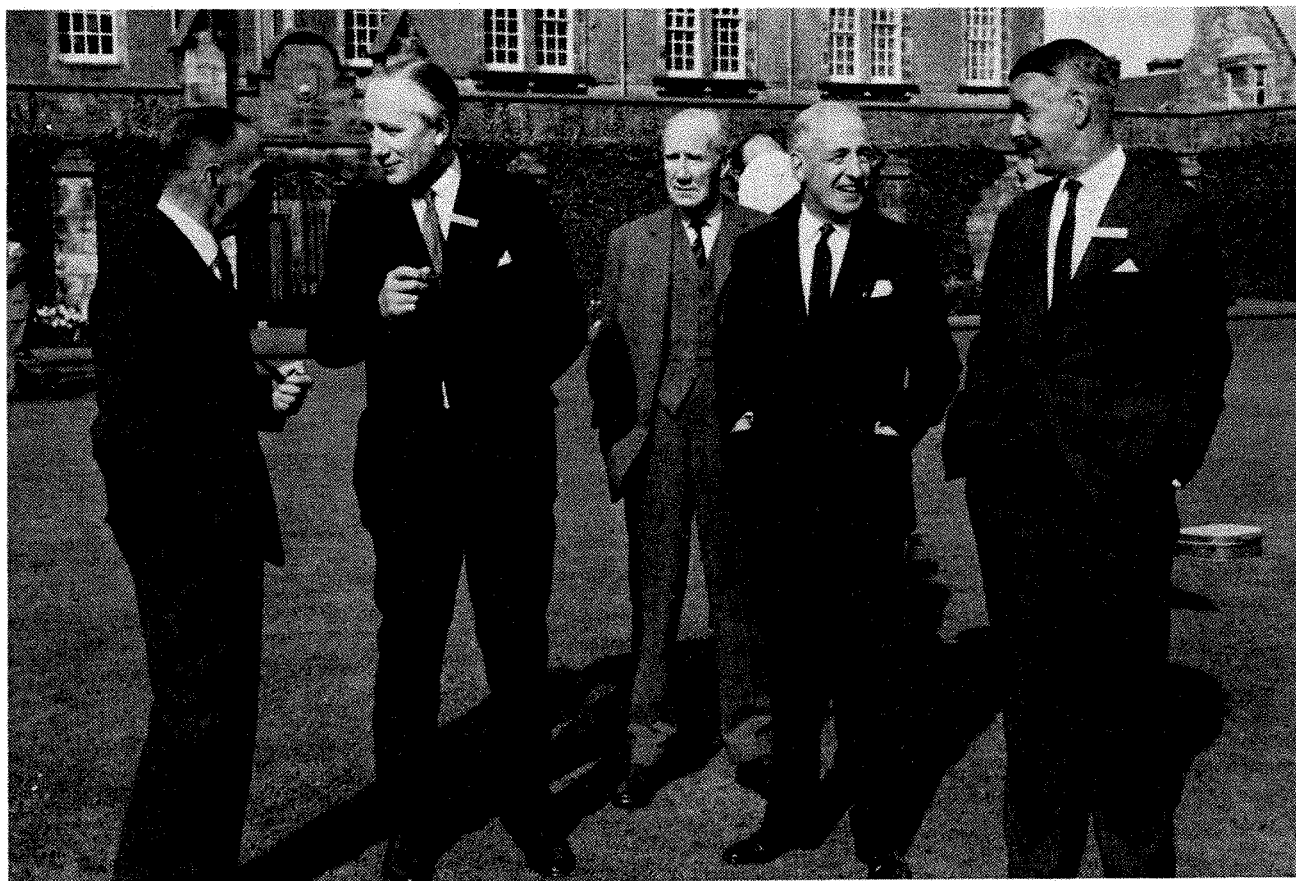

A team consisting of Miss Johne Souden, Miss D. M. Vaughan, Mr J. L. Hatrick and Mr McCloy won a light-hearted treasure hunt.

Course dinner

The official proceedings of the school terminated on Monday evening with a dinner at which the toast of the University was proposed by the Vice-President, to which Professor J. W. L. Adams, B.A., M.A., Bell Professor of Education in the University, replied. The toast of the Institute was proposed by Mr Treffers and the President responded.

With many post-qualifying courses being run it might be expected that the Summer School would lose some of its appeal; it is abundantly evident, however, that this is not the case. The opportunity which the School provides for the exchange of views among members and the expression of controversial opinions on accounting and other subjects is always appreciated by those taking part. St Andrews is, of course, an ideal setting for the School, where members continue to be charmed by the ancient University and its surroundings.

The success of the School was due in no small measure to the organizing committee under the convenership of Mr T. N. Ritchie T.D., C.A., the contributors, discussion group leaders and the Institute secretariat. Arrangements have been made for the fifteenth Summer School to be held at St Andrews from Friday to Tuesday, June 23rd to 27th, 1967.

Informal interlude at St Andrews (left to right): Mr E. Birnie Reid, O.B.E. (Mil.), T.D., D.L., C.A., President of the Scottish Institute, with Mr E. H. V. McDougall, Secretary, Mr G. I. Stewart, C.B.E., M.C., C.A. and Mr James T. Dowling, C.A., Past Presidents, and Professor D. S. Anderson, M.A., C.A., the Vice-President.

Mr A. G. DesBrisay, of Penticton, spokesman for a small public accounting firm in the interior of British Columbia, predicted that the 1970 concept (a university degree as a prerequisite for entry into the profession) will virtually eliminate chartered accountant training in small offices and result in small firms employing book-keeper trainees and female machine operators. 'In many ways this would appear to be a sad commentary', said Mr DesBrisay, 'but on reflection it would perhaps appear to be a good thing because with the ever-increasing body of knowledge it is doubtful whether the practitioner in a small independent office can provide the training to produce "fully qualified" chartered accountants. For example, how many small offices handle audits involving the major use of computers? How many are thoroughly familiar with systems analysis and data processing? With the intensive "classroom" training being offered by large firms it would appear impossible to compete and I question the advisability of small firms even trying to do so.'

Mr DesBrisay contended that junior colleges, most of which were offering book-keeping and accounting training, will be able to provide small firms with a continuous source of staff. He suggested that the further training they will receive during two to four years in a chartered accountant's office will enable them to go into industry and command salaries at a level considerably higher than would be the case without such training and at the same time help to solve one of businesses' most pressing problems of obtaining trained staff. Mr DesBrisay said also that he was not concerned about such trainees being over-confident and starting up in public book-keeping practice on their own.

Varied technical and social programmes

The three-day programme with two plenary sessions, nine technical sessions and more than thirty speakers covered a variety of topics including graphic aids for management, integrated information systems, the computer and the human mind, problems of special concern in the audit of small business and recent Ontario securities legislation and what it means in Canada.

A varied programme of social events included an opening reception for members and their wives, an outdoor barbeque followed by a high-spirited evening recalling the days of a wide-open western pioneer town of the 1900s with the old saloon, gambling tables, etc., and the closing reception and dinner dance.

An interesting programme was arranged for the ladies including a buffet luncheon featuring many national dishes, entertainment by folk singers and dancers in their national costumes and a display of ethnic arts and crafts.

Scottish Institute's Summer School

Fourteenth Annual Event at St Andrews

THE fourteenth annual summer school of The Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland, held at the University of St Andrews from Friday to Tuesday, September 9th to 13th, was attended by 102 members and, under the arrangements recently made for exchange visits with The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, six members of the English Institute, including Mr K. J. Sharp, T.D., M.A., J.P., F.C.A., a member of Council and of the Courses Committee.

Also present as guests were Mr H. C. Treffers (Netherlands) and Professor Dr Louis Perridon, President and Secretary-General, respectively, of Union Européenne des Experts Comptables Economiques et Financiers, and Mr B. W. McCloy, M.COM.(Otago), A.R.A.N.Z., A.I.A.N.Z. (Travelling Scholar, Incorporated Institute of Accountants of New Zealand).

On arrival members were addressed by Mr R. G. Cant, M.A., Reader in Scottish History, University of St Andrews, on the history of the University. And at dinner which followed, members of the school were welcomed by Professor Charles F. Davidson, O.B.E., D.SC., M.I.M.M., F.R.S.E., Professor of Geology in the University, and by the President of the Scottish Institute, Mr E. Birnie Reid, O.B.E., T.D., D.L., C.A.

After dinner the first address entitled 'The responsibilities of the professional man' was given by Dr G. A. P. Wyllie, B.SC., PH.D., F.INST.P., F.R.S.E. In the course of his address Dr Wyllie gave a historical account of the growth of the professions both in Britain and abroad and outlined the qualities essential to enable the professional man to give the best service to his client. An interesting discussion ensued.

Company law

On Saturday morning, Mr J. L. Kirkpatrick, C.A. (partner in Thomson McLintock & Co, Chartered Accountants, Glasgow) gave a short summary of his paper on 'Some thoughts on what a new Companies Act should contain'. He examined the now defunct Companies Bill 1966, suggesting those parts of it which he thought should be repeated in the next Bill, and indicating additional matters which he would like to see form part of a satisfactory updating of company law.

His approach was to find a balance between statutory requirements and voluntary acceptance of principles of disclosure. The remaining technical sessions of the day were occupied in discussion of Mr Kirkpatrick's paper.

On Sunday morning members worshipped in the Collegiate Church of St Salvator, where a special service was conducted by the Reverend Robin D. Buchanan-Smith, B.A., PH.M., Chaplain to the St Andrews Colleges. The lessons were read by the President of the Institute and the Vice-President, Professor D. S. Anderson, M.A., C.A.

Business expansion

The business sessions on Sunday and on Monday morning were allocated to 'Expanding one's business', a paper presented by Mr A. W. Knight, B.COM. (finance director, Courtaulds Ltd). In his paper, Mr Knight reflected on the conditions necessary for the expansion of a business, lower tier to that of the higher qualification would be necessary for those with the determination and ability to climb it.

Changing role of accountants in management

At the luncheon following the general meeting, the conference was addressed by Mr Robert M. Trueblood, President of the American Institute, who described the course of the accountant's attest function over the past fifty years and how it had shifted from absolute determinable results of completed occurrences to conjectures about the financial results of operating methodologies. He indicated that the next fifty years will see a further shift from attesting to financial results per se to the total information and managerial process. 'However revolutionary this may seem,' said Mr Trueblood, 'the shift represents evolution, not revolution.'

The American President emphasized that in the future business operations will be more unified than at present and that this will be reflected more strongly than ever in the information system. 'No longer will we be able to talk about financial information alone, rather the information system of the future will best be described as multiple, and multiple in many ways in which strictly accounting information will only be a part.'

Mr Trueblood said that as a result the accountant of the future will be required to become a generalist on the one hand, dealing with a wide range of management problems and a synthesist on the other, putting together in summarized statements the ultimate results of this process. 'He must in fact become comfortable in a probabilistic and an undeterministic world.' Mr Trueblood remarked that education as well as attestation is involved. 'As the attest function moves from simple, determinate financial quantifications to that of more subjective output, to accounting processes, and finally to the developing attestation of the management process, changes in education will take place.' Mr Trueblood predicted that academic programmes at present under development will admirably fulfil the future educational needs of the accountant in his new environment.

Need for specialization

In a paper on 'The changing emphasis in public practice - need for specialization', Mr F. S. Capon, vice-president, Du Pont of Canada Ltd, held to the view that if the accounting profession fails to recognize the necessity for specialization in today's complex business, political and social life it is being totally unrealistic. He pointed out that already in most professions - notably medicine, engineering and law - it was acknowledged that the total skills required for further development cannot be acquired by a single individual and that decisions can no longer be made in glorious isolation. The day of the dictator or president was over as we entered the era of management by teams of experts.

Mr Capon said that this same need of great depth of expert knowledge existed also in the accounting profession. As an example, he cited today's tax laws which were so complex and their effects so great that tax advice can no longer be relied on from an accountant who has the knowledge to obtain his certificate but who, in spite of trying to remain in touch with every aspect of accounting, had failed to become a tax expert. With high tax rates, tax incentives become important levers to achieve economic objectives, he said, thus increasing their complexity.

Mr Capon recognized that there will always be room for individual general practitioners and small accounting firms to advise small business in a general way on problems in which large sums of money were not at stake. He stressed, however, that a growing proportion of Canada's total business will be carried out by huge international corporations and that 'the great responsibilities, the new knowledge' will come from dedicated specialists who will each have to master relatively narrow sectors of the total accounting scene.

Looking into the future, Mr Capon believed that the opportunities for the accounting profession will be determined by economic needs and accomplishments. Discernible trends - population, technology, productivity and so forth - were all in the early phase of an upward growth curve. Mental and physical ability to produce efficiently was increasing at a staggering rate. The challenge to business, professional and political leaders will be to maintain enough control to prevent the system from disintegrating through the sheer centrifugal force of its gathering momentum and, because control depended upon even more accurate and faster information, the accountant will be a vital figure in providing the means for essential control.

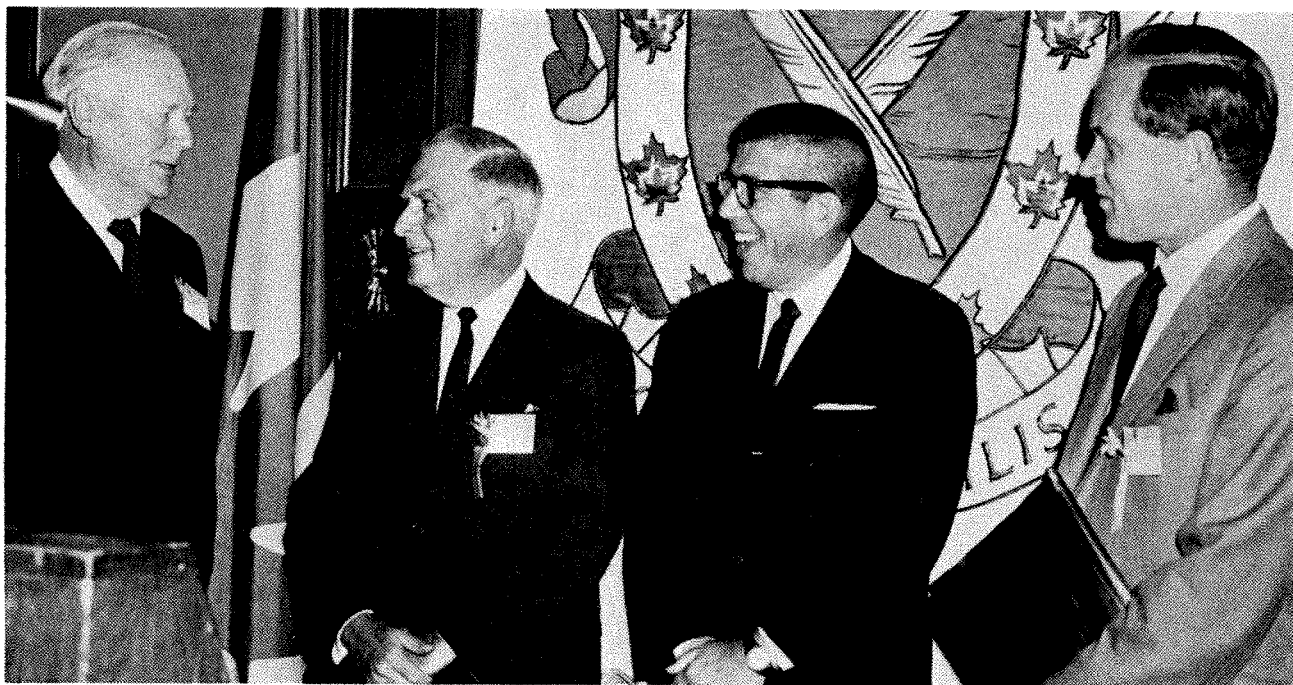

Mr Capon concluded by suggesting that no large corporation can expect to keep and maintain a complete range of skilled experts, and to do so would mean cutting itself off from the vast and constantly changing knowledge which is being developed elsewhere as a result of the varied experience of others. Experts, he said, cannot continue to grow and develop in a captive atmosphere. For this reason he saw a growing need for professional skills of the highest order in public accounting firms.

Changing emphasis in public practice

With the prospect that within the next few years those entering the profession will be required to have a university degree, future staffing problems of practising firms was the subject of another technical session on the changing emphasis in public practice. Mr Oscar Antel, of Winnipeg, said that chartered accountants will have to give a great deal more thought to the type of staff they will need to employ and train for some of the less advanced audit routine work to allow those with a university background to be employed in more challenging and advanced aspects of the audit programme.

He observed that the use of audit clerks was not a new concept but is an interesting departure from the present structure of many small offices. He suggested that small accounting firms should start developing the use of audit clerks now rather than wait until the situation was on top of them and that the provincial Institutes should begin to explore ways and means of developing a general training programme for those who do not have degrees but who will be able to look forward to advancement in the audit field as their knowledge expands.

Mergers may become a trend, he said, so that merged firms of small practitioners may be better equipped to handle training programmes and make more economical use of data processing equipment. On the other hand it may be possible for practitioners to think of a system of shared services in such areas as training clerks, renting equipment and operators until such time as they develop their practices to a point where they can operate independently under the new concept. Mr Antel said that it may even be possible for national firms to offer assistance to smaller firms in this area.

Sir Henry Benson, C.B.E., F.C.A., President of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, chatting with (left to right) Mr R. L. Bamford, F.C.A., retiring President of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, Mr Robert M. Trueblood, C.P.A., President of the American Institute of Certified Public Accountants and Mr A. F. Templaar, Vice-President of the Nederlands Instituut van Accountants.

research', said Mr Bamford, 'and it is in this area perhaps more than any other that the Canadian Institute, as a national body, should provide the leadership and the work force which in itself is ample justification for the necessity of a national entity deserving of the full support and co-operation of every member of the profession.'

English President's address

He was preceded by Sir Henry Benson, President of the English Institute, who suggested that as accountants in Canada, the United States and the United Kingdom report each year 'on the truth and fairness' of balance sheets and profit and loss accounts involving vast sums of money, it might be worth considering the merits of publishing at frequent intervals a paper on accounting and auditing developments in all three countries which could be made available to the members of each Institute.

Sir Henry then outlined the growth and operation of the English Institute with its 41,500 members, 16,500 students and 60-man Council, and greatly expanded publications programme, and dealt with some of the changes which may be in prospect for the profession in the United Kingdom if it is to serve the public to best advantage for the next twenty-five years. Sir Henry referred to the considerable efforts being made by the Institute to help members in practice and industry through its rapidly developing public relations and publications programme and cited as an example the work that had been accomplished in disseminating information on the 1965 Finance Act.

'The day after the Bill became an Act', he said, 'we published explanatory booklets on both the corporation tax and the capital gains tax and within two months sold over 50,000 copies of each. The immensity of the administrative task can be measured by the fact that during its passage through the House of Commons there were 450 amendments to the original Bill, each of which had to be examined as it was passed so that its effect could be incorporated in the booklets which were then in draft.

'From time to time other Bills appear which affect members', Sir Henry said, remarking that the Institute maintains contact with Government on matters which it considers proper to raise, whether in the professional or the public interest. He mentioned, in particular, representations on such legislation as the Industrial Development Bill, company law reform and the selective employment tax.

Future of the profession in Britain

Sir Henry said that exploratory talks are now in progress with other bodies in the United Kingdom to consider the future of the accountancy profession and that a report and specific proposals are expected towards the end of the year. Some of the most important subjects being discussed deal with reducing the number of professional bodies, raising the entry standard to students who have attained minimum university entrance requirements, broadening the syllabus in which students are examined to cover a more detailed knowledge of industrial accounting, considering whether students should undertake a period of full-time study on accounting and related subjects before entering articles and the advisability of allowing students to serve their apprenticeship either in a practising office or in industry as they might select. The extent to which specialization should be recognized and encouraged by way of post-qualification diplomas in, say, taxation and management information is also being considered and the possibility of establishing a second tier of qualified accountants who would not be chartered accountants. The second tier, said Sir Henry, might be expected to have lower educational and training standards but nevertheless be able to fill important positions in the more routine accountancy tasks in industry and practising offices. A ladder from the management process as an educator – new input/output devices and pictorial displays are already available. Such techniques will give the manager of the future instant access to information in a form which he can readily interpret, Dr Porter forecast.

Dr Porter concluded his address by suggesting three areas where Canada is in a strategic position to play an important pioneering role in the development of modern management:

(1) Co-operative groups sharing a computer

'At present at least 20 per cent of companies' total efforts are spent on routine paperwork and savings of hundreds of millions of dollars could be made through groups getting together in this way.'

(2) The use of the computer in management-labour relations

'The field of industrial relations is archaic to an unbelievable degree and being strangled by its own environment. The computer would provide an appropriate "anti-environment" and open up a new era in management labour relations.'

(3) A national business information bank

'The United States, and especially U.S. business and industry, is too big and complex for such experimentation. Within the next ten years positive steps towards information banks will be almost mandatory. If adequate information storage and retrieval systems are not available to deal with accumulated data in never-ending streams, management may be in serious difficulty.'

The acquiring of new basic knowledge and skill by senior executives is one of the most common needs and harrowing facts of electronic technology, Dr Porter noted. The next step will be 'major changes in education for management, both philosophically and technologically oriented, to stimulate the consciousness and hence the learning process'.

Education and research vital to the profession

In a hard-hitting keynote address at the annual general meeting, Mr R. L. Bamford, F.C.A., President of the Canadian Institute, said that education and research were the two most vital areas facing the profession today and warned that if chartered accountants do not come to grips with the problems involved in these areas they are in grave danger of selling themselves short in the struggle to maintain their present position of leadership. 'On education depends the entrance, progress and ultimate success of every member', said Mr Bamford, 'and hence the very existence of the profession itself.'

Commenting first on education for the profession, Mr Bamford said that because of the 1970 concept, whereby all students seeking articles must from that date possess a university degree, the profession has a great deal to do in attracting prospective entrants.

'We would be foolish to assume that by 1970 there will be a large body of university graduates eager and anxious to enter our offices and train for a professional degree. Competition is becoming keener every year and as a profession we are losing out to commerce and industry by default because we have thus far made little headway in researching the needs and desires of present-day graduates from our institutions of higher learning. Somehow by 1970 we must, by closer co-operation with the universities, provide our students with a broader based background of formal education to meet the needs of the profession so that the provincial Institutes can to a larger extent withdraw from the field of formal education while at the same time maintain control over admission requirements. I have now reached the conclusion that it is essential that we change the nature of our practices to provide more of the challenging type of employment for university graduates which will regain for the profession some of the lustre which has unquestionably become dulled by our lack of understanding and appreciation of the type of post-graduate training which present-day conditions demand.'

Mr Bamford next referred to education in the profession and forecast courses of instruction for the university graduate which would embrace advanced studies in such subjects as taxation, accounting for management, systems and procedures, business finance, computer systems, financial analysis, functional auditing to name but a few, followed by examinations and possibly a thesis for qualification.

Need for specialized studies

In a third educational area Mr Bamford said that there was need for studies in depth in specialized fields such as taxation, management consulting and computer programming but that they should not be so highly priced to assure their financial success that they become restricted to a limited number of members.

'As an Institute we should be prepared to subsidize courses of this kind to keep them within reach of all members. We cannot expect the membership to subsidize courses which are only going to be available to a few but, by the same token, we cannot and should not expect the Institute to launch out into a series of courses in depth with no reserve funds to research, staff and present them.'

In his introductory remarks Mr Bamford referred to the Institute's operating loss of $27,300 for the year and he now posed the question 'How is an educational and research programme of this kind to be financed?' He said:

'Much of what I have been saying will, of course, be recognized as supporting argument for the proposal to substantially increase fees to members starting this year. I make no apologies for the proposed fee increases. Compared with the cost of services which I feel the members are entitled to expect, the present cost to members in annual fees is minimal and could easily be doubled or tripled without placing any undue financial burden. The Canadian Institute, during the past year, allocated 4 per cent of its expenditures on research. For 1967 and future years it will be budgeting to increase the proportion of expenditures on research to nearly 10 per cent. I foresee the day in the not too distant future when the research function as a service to members will become the major responsibility of the Institute and we should be gearing our activities and building up our financial reserves to enable us to discharge this responsibility.'

Mr Bamford concluded his remarks by emphasizing that the time had come for the profession to direct most of its attention to the fields of education and research. He pointed out that a special committee of the Canadian Institute was looking very seriously into the matter of long-range planning so that the stage will be set to meet the demands of the rapidly advancing technological changes with which the profession is faced.

'Progress in the profession as in any other field of endeavour is dependent upon continuous and intensive

by RENNY ENGLEBERT, Editor of The Canadian Chartered Accountant

A JOINT visit to Canada by the President and Secretary of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales for the first time in the Institute's history is a news item of considerable significance. The occasion was the sixty-fourth annual conference of The Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants held in Regina, Saskatchewan, from August 28th-31st when Sir Henry Benson, C.B.E., F.C.A., and Mr C. A. Evan-Jones, M.B.E., were afforded the opportunity of on-the-spot exchanges of views with their counterparts in Canada and from the United States. It also enabled them to meet other leading members of the profession who were there to discuss professional problems and to further their contribution to the growth and good health of the business community and that of the nation as a whole.

Mr Ralph L. Bamford, F.C.A., President of The Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, and Mr C. F. Westerman, F.C.A., President of the Saskatchewan Institute of Chartered Accountants, were joint hosts. Some 675 members and their ladies attended and the American Institute of Certified Public Accountants was represented by its President, Mr Robert M. Trueblood, with Mr John L. Carey, Executive Director, and the Nederlands Instituut van Accountants by its Vice-President, Mr A. F. Tempelaar.

The computer in management

The use of computers and the changes that are taking place in public practice formed the basis of a number of discussions at several technical sessions. No subject could be more important to the profession today than computers, and their future role is going to have a profound influence in reshaping the structure of Society and the operations of business and industry. Slavishly to fit this new tool into the framework of management as it exists today could only create havoc and place society in peril. Management must ensure that it is both physically and mentally attuned to the new concepts of information and communication and the professions must be prepared to reappraise the foundation of their disciplines.

This was the theme of Dr Arthur Porter's address 'The role of the computer in management', when he spoke at the opening plenary session. Dr Porter, who holds a Ph.D. from the University of Manchester and worked during the war as a scientific officer at the Admiralty in London, is head of the Department of Engineering at the University of Toronto.

The first main point of his paper was to make it clear that any profession which does not feel that from time to time its disciplines should be subject to soul-searching - 'essentially a symptom of vitality' - may be in imminent danger of obliteration. He went on to say that a critical review of the evolution of a discipline or profession inevitably involves the formal educational programmes associated with it and, in supporting the introduction of the new mathematics, new sciences and new languages as an important step in the evolution of educational practice, he foresaw that within the next few years they would be very much in evidence in the educational programmes of the accounting profession.

Dr Porter stated that, traditionally, members of the profession have always acted as confidential advisers to leaders of business and industry and that this could not be otherwise in view of the accountant's intimate knowledge of financial affairs. He stressed that in today's burgeoning technological society the profession had a special responsibility in this area which has assumed new dimensions.

Dr Porter then proceeded to consider some of the developments which are reshaping the environments of business and industry. On changes in the work force and on education he had this to say:

'During the past few years there have been notable shifts towards the service industries. This has been due in part to the impact of automation on production and to the freeing of workers from machine tasks. The general level of education is rising continually while the need for highly skilled specialists in all fields continues to increase. Since education is being considered as a lifelong activity, work and education must be regarded as indistinguishable. Such important questions as how to store and retrieve information will inevitably arise in an advanced society where the critical resource is knowledge.'

Another important factor in the changing business environment is the tendency for organizations to increase in size, and on this subject Dr Porter said:

'Growth will result from both existing programmes and activities and from diversification such as when a single corporate entity takes over new areas. A pertinent question, especially in the light of the communications and data processing revolution is "Is there an optimum size to an organization?" All we can say is that the problem of growth must be recognized as a significant factor in the environment and associated with it is the question of the increasing interdependence of industries on both national and international bases. It is here that the computer will be used most effectively as an analytical tool'.

Modern organization structure

Dr Porter pointed out that another prime issue associated with the management process is the organization structure.

'The modern organization has multiple goals and issues,' he said, 'and no single person can be well informed on all of them. This suggests that in the future the organization will no longer be based on the classic hierarchy structure but will involve a much higher degree of flexibility with many more managers involved in policy decisions. This change in structure is in large part due to modern communication systems which provide immediate access to information stored either in a computer or in associated magnetic tapes. In the decision making process, more consideration will be given to more opinions - in other words the organization of the future will be more democratic with the computer playing an indispensable role'.

The computer will also play an important part in the

CITY NOTES

THE new currency swap arrangements have brought the gilt-edged market out of the wilderness and a few blooms back to the stock-market at a time when the prospect of anything growing was beginning to look decidedly bleak. The rise in interest rates, which looked to have some way to go, now appears to be over the hump.

The I.C.I. 8 per cent Loan Stock, offered at 98, carries the prospect of at least a four-points premium and that is a measure of the change wrought in the interest rate position in a matter of weeks. The rise in the gilt-edged market has, inevitably, brought the question of Bank rate to the boil again but the general assumption is that long-term interest rates will be allowed to sink through market influences, and that any Bank rate reduction, when it comes, will merely be an adjustment to an already established long-term interest rate level.

Firmness in the gilt-edged market has put an uncertain peg into equities. There is a two-way pull in equities as the result of the changing gilt-edged yield basis on the one hand, and the obvious evidence of a downturn in industrial earnings on the other.

There has been some fair industrial profit news from a handful of big-name companies, but the bulk of profit and dividend reporting has not been exactly encouraging. It is still uncertain whether the equity market fully discounts the severity of the enforced industrial downturn.

THE decision of three directors of Consolidated Trust to forgo any profits on their holdings in Second Premier Trust – the Garda-type executive incentive scheme – has been seen in the City as a turn in the battle between two heads of opposing investment houses. Mr Kenneth Keith of Hill, Samuel & Co, is a director of Consolidated Trust which is a trust in the Drayton Group; Mr John Spencer Wills of the Drayton Group has been a vigorous defender of Second Premier. Whether Mr Keith's success in persuading the three Consolidated Trust directors to forgo their Second Premier profits ultimately results in the Trust's winding-up remains to be seen, but it could be the thin edge of the wedge.

THE Building Societies are still clearly perturbed about the effect of their decision to delay a rise in interest rates. The rise in the gilt-edged market and the downturn in long-term interest rates could not have been better timed from the building societies' point of view. But if directly competitive interest rates remain high and the building societies fail to attract cash in a necessary volume, there is likely to be a decided shortage of mortgage finance before long. The building societies are worried lest this shortage of finance leads the Government to increase – beyond 50 per cent – the share of new houses being built in the public sector assuming the target of 500,000 houses a year by 1970 is still the aim.

THE new swap arrangements are likely to make the International Monetary Fund meeting's deliberations on international liquidity arrangements even more academic than they have been in the past few years. It is generally agreed by commentators that central bank arrangements are merely a substitute for the wider agreement that there should be on the question of a new international liquidity basis. But agreement by commentators is one thing and agreement by Governments very much another. For all the deliberations and discussions there have been on this question, there is still no 100 per cent agreement on what the basic problem is, let alone on what the solution may be. If all countries want to see their balance of payments positions put to rights under present conditions before they will agree to any new currency system, then agreement is still a very long way off.

PERTINENT QUESTION No. 4

'Why ask the
NSPCC about widows' pensions?'

Most people, it's true, ask advice of doctors, solicitors, clergymen - depending on the problem. But in our complex society there are many people left bewildered, ignorant, frightened . . . and ignorance may lead to suffering for the children. Where there's a child in need, there's the N.S.P.C.C. . . . with advice, if that's what's lacking. The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children does MORE than help cruelly assaulted children. It exists to help children in any and every way. In turn, it needs YOUR help. Please send a donation now to: Room 1a, 1 Riding House Street, London W1. Telephone LANGham 8812.
